THE LITERARY WEEK

HAVING been brought up in an old-fashioned school, we were taught to regard all attempts at spelling reform as unscientific, unscholarly and detestable. And yet, when such a scholar as Professor Skeat addresses to such a body as the British Academy a paper which a first glance shows to recommend such an attempt, we feel, even before we have read the pamphlet, that there must be more to be said for the proposal than our traditions and our prejudice have allowed. And to read Professor Skeat's pamphlet is to learn that it is our present spelling which is unscientific, unscholarly and detestable. Why do we write "deal" and "clean" when we say "deel" and "cleen"? Because Norman scribes in the reigns of the first two Edwards did not understand the Anglo-Saxon symbol æ. Why do we write "have" and "give" for "hav" and "giv," and spell the verb "live" in the same way as the adjective "live"? Because we are preserving a use that became useless when u ceased to be written for v, and the final e lost its significance. Why do we write "comfort" and "monkey," when we say "cumfort" and "munkey"? Because the later Norman scribes found that um and un were indistinct—as they are apt to be to this day—in manuscript. And when we dub "labor" an American form, we are revealing our ignorance of the state of our spelling of the unaccented syllable "before Columbus was born."

These are only a few of the stabs which Professor Skeat deals to our pride of scholarship, in a paper which will, at least, deliver the question of spelling reform from the ridicule it has hitherto endured. His point is this: that we cling to the old forms of spelling, without realising how those old forms were pronounced. Written words are mere symbols of sounds. The spoken forms change from generation to generation (we have touched on this subject occasionally in these columns); the spellings have, indeed, been changed, in the endeavour to get a better representation of the sounds intended to be suggested, but mainly before the increase of printing had made the public so familiar with the printed form as to dissociate it from the spoken, and then only in a half-hearted and often ignorant manner. It follows that "a large number of our words are spelled so as to show how they were formerly pronounced, which at once explains why they are no longer phonetically exact."

Besides being cumbrous and troublesome to learn, causing unnecessary trouble to teachers and tears to children, and sending up the printing-bills of the British Empire, according to Professor Skeat's calculation, by some thousands of pounds annually, our spelling is, therefore, unscientific and unscholarly. What is the remedy? According to Professor Skeat, to use our pretty accurate knowledge of how Latin was pronounced in classical times; to pronounce it so ourselves and make our boys pronounce it so, and to adopt the Italian sounds of vowels as our guide in phonetic spelling. That great simplification would result from a well-considered scheme of spelling reform, no one, we believe, has denied, except some few "hard-shell" objectors who declare that they will be unable to distinguish "sea" from "see," when they find no difficulty in distinguishing "see" (videre) from "See" (sedes).

And, detestable as we shall continue to consider it to have to write "solv," "promis," "hed," "peepl," "feeld" "looz," cum," "labor," "decalog," "eg," "comand" and other hideous forms which Professor Skeat recommends, we are quite aware that their beauty or ugliness is a matter of familiarity (indeed, we rather like "looz," and "eg" is, at least, no uglier than "egg"); and, in any case, it is better to endure ugliness than to be incorrect. The people who have poured scorn on spelling reform as unscholarly must be the first to adopt a reformed spelling which is proved to be more scholarly than their own. The sentimental objection—that mistakes hallowed by time carry with them a fragrance of association more valuable than mere accuracy—is not one that can outweigh the claims of scholarship and practical use. But the great point—a point on which we have no intention of pronouncing pro or con—is just that: On which side lies true scholarship? The name of Professor Skeat is a warranty of enormous weight, but—will no champion arise to prove him wrong, and save us our eggs and our heads?

All visitors to Rome know and love the Trinita steps that run up from the Piazza di Spagna; the spot where the flower-sellers and the artists' models gather to make a brilliant patch of colour against the prevailing red-brown tone of the city. Not all visitors, strange to say, have noticed the tablet on the wall of the house at the bottom of the steps on the right as you look up towards the church; a tablet that records the death in that house on February 23, 1821, of John Keats. The attractions of the spot are so well known that it was a foregone conclusion that some day some one would try to build a hotel there; and not long ago the house in which Keats died was threatened with demolition for that purpose. A group of British and American men of letters in Rome, at the initiative—to their honour be it recorded—of the American members, intervened to try and save it. English, Roman and American committees were formed, and after keeping their proceedings as quiet as possible lest publicity should send up the price of the house, they have obtained an option of purchase, and nearly half of the £4000 or thereabouts required for the purchase of the house.

The scheme is now made public and appeals for further donations are issued. In the New York Times and Saturday Review Mr. Robert Underwood Johnson, the secretary of the American Committee, states that the project comprises the purchase of the house, the perpetual oversight and defence of the graves of Keats, Shelley and their two friends, Joseph Severn, the artist, and Edward John Trelawney, the author of "Records of Shelley, Byron, and the Author," who are buried beside them in the cemetery outside the Porta San Paolo; and the establishment in the Keats appartement of a memorial library, to include editions of Keats and Shelley, biographies, criticisms, manuscripts, letters, portraits and so forth.

The English Committee, under the chairmanship of Lord Crewe, includes nearly every distinguished man of letters living; and the project has the hearty approval of the King and the President of the United States and King Victor Emmanuel. Donations should be sent either to Mr. Harold Boulton, Honorary Secretary, 120 Victoria Street, S.W., or to Messrs. Child, 1 Fleet Street, for the account of the Keats-Shelley Memorial.

A correspondent asks what is the meaning of the phrase occurring on p. 611 of last week's ACADEMY: "The most illustrious poet who ever was made lawyer." We hasten to explain that "lawyer" should be "Laureate," and that the reference is to Tennyson. "Your encouragement," wrote Palgrave, ungrammatically, in the Dedication to Tennyson of the "Golden Treasury," "given while traversing the wild scenery of Treryn Dinas, led me to begin the work; and it has been completed under your advice and assistance."

By the time these lines appear the Warwick Pageant will have been visited, described, illustrated and discussed by half Britain and three-quarters of America, and nothing remains to be said about it. It was, from all points of view, completely successful; such a spectacle as has not been seen since the age of Elizabeth, such a concentration of local force on a deed of pietas as has not occurred since the palmy days of the Miracles. It is easy to sneer at "parish-patriotism"; it is only from such pride as this that the larger world-patriotism can find development, and he will never be a good citizen of the world who is not a good citizen of his town or village.

With or without the authority of history, Mr. Parker began the story of Warwick with the capture by the Romans of Caradoc; and in doing so he did well from one point of view at least. We are too little interested in these early British heroes—possibly because we ourselves stand to a part of the world in the same relation as Rome once stood to us. People who are old enough to have learned their dates by the now discarded method of memoria technica may remember that:

Boadicea, through loss in strife,
In sixty-two destroyed her life,
Caractacus in nine years more
Banged his head against the door.

Delight in those immortal lines and an occasional glance at Bonduca on the Thames embankment limit their interest.

It is curious to note that the Romans themselves made very little of their conquests and deeds of valour in Britain. In a book recently published by the Manchester University Press, "Melandra Castle," we find a very interesting paper by Dora Limebeer, M.A., on "Britain in the Roman Poets," in which are collected all the references. The Romans hated service in Britain. To begin with, it was so far off—in quite another world—"penitus toto divisos orbe . . . Britannos" says Virgil—and "alio in orbe . . . Britannos" says a writer even so late as Claudian; sundered from Rome by a sea which was not only a terror in itself but was "beluosus," the home of the dread "ballaena Britannica." And its inhabitants, as the Roman poets saw them, were blood-thirsty savages, dyed green and blue—a barbarous practice to which Propertius compares the dyed hair of a lady he wishes to insult. It was the Romans who started the fashion of declaring our climate abominable. Service here meant no glory, no plunder, very little pay, and very hard work making roads and bridges, while the nimble Briton, "hospitibus ferus" as ever, darted about in his coracle, heaving more dangerous things than half-bricks at the stranger.

"Grandeur and wildness of scenery," writes Miss Limebeer, "were to most of the Romans merely untidy obstructions to comfort and conquest. . . . And why go to Britain when all that was really pleasant or useful could be enjoyed at Rome? First-rate oysters, for example, and second-rate pearls, and ornamental British chariots for fashionable use. There was British basket work for Roman ladies and hunting dogs for the men.

Divisa Britannia mittit
Veloces, nostrique orbis venatibus aptos."

The hunting of their world! "Pictured Britons [even in Virgil's time] were interwoven in the curtains at the theatre, and real Britons really killed each other at the triumphal games of Claudius in a mock attack or an imitation Camolodunum set up in the field of Mars."

One or two deaths that should not pass unrecorded have occurred since the publication of our last number. M. Albert Sorel, a name too little known in this country, was a historian of great eminence, who only a few weeks before his death had been awarded by the Institute the Osiris prize of one hundred thousand francs. His chief work was the unfinished "Europe et la Révolution Française," a subject which his minute research and genius for interpretation had placed in a new light, and in which his admirable literary style was shown at its best. Mr. William Day, of Day and Son, the well-known firm of lithographers, will be remembered by some as having made paper money for Kossuth, and being tried with him on a charge of levying war on the Emperor of Austria. The notes were ordered to be destroyed, but a few copies were saved and are treasured by the family. George Augustus Sala was at one time a draughtsman in his office. The name of Mr. Budgett Meakin is not, perhaps, so familiar to readers of the ACADEMY as his writing, which frequently appeared in these columns. An authority on Morocco and the Moors, Mr. Meakin, who was under forty when he died, acted as special correspondent to the Tribune at the Algeiras Conference; and another subject which he had taken up with characteristic enthusiasm was the housing of the poor. His loss will be deeply felt by the British Institute of Social Service, which he helped to found, as well as by a very large number of personal friends. We regret to learn from Budapest that Dr. Joseph Körösy de Szántó, a distinguished member of the Hungarian Academy of Science and of the International Statistical Institute, and founder and director of the Bureau Communal de Statistique of the city of Budapest, died there on June 24.

An interesting and authentic relic of Oliver Goldsmith—the desk chair he used when writing "The Traveller" and "The Deserted Village"—is to be offered for sale at Messrs. Sotheby's on Tuesday next. At the time of his death Goldsmith was in debt to his intimate friend, Edmund Bott, who had lent him a considerable sum of money; being thus his principal debtor, he at once took possession of the Doctor's effects. The library was sold, but this chair was retained by Bott, as being the most personal and precious relic of his friend, and taken to his house in Christchurch. Its descent through the families of Mowbray and Shaw-Lefevre to its present possessor is known step by step, and documents proving its identity accompany it.

The question of copyright exists in Roumania as elsewhere. By a law passed in 1862, the rights of an author are safeguarded for his life and the ten years following his death, but by Article 9 of the same law a foreigner, to secure these privileges, must deposit four printed copies of his work in Roumania, and must make a written request for its registration. This article, however, fell into desuetude, and in 1904 it was suppressed. Nevertheless, considerable doubt seems to be felt as to the exact position of a foreign author, more especially as by a law of 1885 Roumanian authors must present three copies of their work to the State with a view to the endowment of public libraries. Two French publishers have brought a test case to the courts, and have obtained a verdict in favour of the exemption of French works from Article 9. But the High Court of Appeal has yet to give its decision. The probabilities are that Roumania will ultimately adhere to the Convention of Berne, in order to put the question of copyright on a satisfactory footing once for all.

The Annual Meeting of the Library Association will be held during the first week in September at Bradford, under the presidency of Sir William H. Bailey. The provisional programme foreshadows papers on important subjects. Village Libraries. Libraries for Secondary Schools, and the Relation of Public Libraries to the Present System of Education are amongst the announcements; and a model "bindery" for a library will be exhibited. We are glad to see that, in addition to the exhibition of best books, it is proposed to issue a list of the best books published between January 1905 and March 1906—but why stop at March? Could it not be continued to June? The value of such a list is inestimable, and the more recent it is the greater is its value.

The three-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Rembrandt is to be celebrated in Amsterdam by an exhibition of modern Dutch art, including works by Alma-Tadema, Jacob Maris, Mauve, Josef Israels, and others, to which Queen Wilhelmina is lending some very valuable pictures from the Royal collections. On July 15 there will be a celebration at the statue of Rembrandt, and in the evening a torchlight procession in costume to the strains of a hymn sung by an immense choir. At Leyden a statue of Rembrandt is to be unveiled on the site of the house where he was born, and an exhibition of his pictures and etchings will be opened.

If it be true that foreign opinion anticipates the judgment of posterity, it would seem that the Pre-Raphaelite movement is destined to be misunderstood. To set the world right on this matter Mr. Holman Hunt has written two prolix volumes with which it is to be presumed M. Raymond Laurent has made himself acquainted. This critic, however, in his Introduction à l'étude du préraphaélisme anglais, contributed to the last two numbers of the Paris review, L'Ermitage, entirely ignores that aspect of Pre-Raphaelitism of which Millais and Holman Hunt were the foremost exponents, and proceeds at considerable length to extract the essence of the movement from the pictures of Rossetti and Burne-Jones and the writings of our nineteenth-century men of letters, who, from Wordsworth to Mr. Bernard Shaw, are all swept into the net of M. Laurent's "préraphaélisme anglais." Setting aside his cardinal blunder in failing to distinguish between the naturalists and the mediævalists, between the progressives and the reactionaries of this school, M. Laurent's analysis of that sentimental archaism which became the Pre-Raphaelitism of Rossetti and his followers is discriminating, if it lacks novelty. But is he not going a little too far in saying that "Death, Tears, Love, these are the sentiments found in every Pre-Raphaelite picture, in every Pre-Raphaelite poem"? Of the partial nature of his investigations no better proof is needed than his final summary: "Des anthropomorphistes, grisés de rêve, épris d'éternité, las de force et de vie passagère, des résumés de tout un grondement de passion s'apaisant, les dernières fleurs épanouies d'un jardin épuisé, gorgé de voluptueuses productions: voilà les préraphaélites."

Two purchases of national interest were made from Messrs. Christie's picture-sale on Saturday. On behalf of the National Portrait Gallery of Scotland Messrs. Agnew paid 255 guineas for Sir Joshua Reynolds's Portrait of Sir John Macpherson, who succeeded Warren Hastings as Governor-General of India; while Mr. Lionel Cust of the National Portrait Gallery, London, secured for 105 guineas the Small Portrait of Edward Gibbon, by H. Walton, which was recently lent by Lord Sheffield to the Oxford Historical Portraits Exhibition. At the same sale two new records were established by the 1150 guineas and 820 guineas given respectively by Mr. Hodgkins for Cosway's drawing, The Fair Stepmother and Ladies of the Loftus Family, and Downman's drawing of John Edwin, Comedian, and Mrs. Mary Wells, Actress (nicknamed "Cowslip") in the Play of "Agreeable Surprises." The keenest contest of the day was occasioned by Turner's The Rape of Europa, which cost Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi 6400 guineas. If we remember rightly, this sum has only three times been exceeded for a Turner subject, the sale-room record for this master being £8610 given by Messrs. Agnew in 1899 for A View in Venice. Compared with the sums given for works by other great masters, these prices are not extravagant, but it must be remembered that the finest examples of Turner's art are, with few exceptions, beyond the reach of dealers, and The Rape of Europa, belonging as it does to the period of the recently discovered Turners at the Tate Gallery, is probably the best example that has yet appeared at an auction.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Cecil Sharp was not entirely surrounded by his friends and colleagues when he continued his folk-song propaganda last week by a concert lecture at Æolian Hall. We recognised a good many such present, but his remarks were really addressed to people who still ask: "What is folk-song?" or, "What is the good of it?" He told them what it is and what is the good of it, and also gave us an amusing picture of his methods of collecting these gems of musical and poetic art, which spring straight from the heart of the people. He sits by the roadside while an old stonebreaker sings to him and covers him with a shower of small stones the while, or he braves the atmosphere of washing-day to gather spoils from an old woman, who can only sing while she is at work. All the genuine folk-song singers are very old, which is in itself sufficient reason for making haste to get their songs upon paper. Very soon the chance will be gone for ever.

But Mr. Sharp asks no one to take his word for it that the songs are worth preservation. A number of very beautiful examples were sung and are published in his valuable collections of "Folk-songs from Somerset." These go to show that there is, or was, somewhere in the English people a deep-rooted and delicate sense of musical rhythm, which should have matched our great poetry with great music. Certain adverse circumstances prevented its fruition, but no unrhythmic race could have produced such songs as "I'm seventeen come Sunday" or "Dabbling in the Dew." But, apart from the musical value of the tunes and the indication in them of musical possibilities as yet unfulfilled by the conscious art of the town musician, the subjects of the songs and the general tone of both words and music indicate, as Mr. Sharp pointed out, racial characteristics for which we do not generally give ourselves, or rather our country cousins, credit. Irrepressible merriment, love-making of a careless and jovial kind, the glorification of a roving life and generally of a "gay dog" attitude, with an occasional touch of good-humoured cynicism, are not the qualities usually attributed to the English son of the soil. Yet this is the perpetual tone of English folk-music and folk-poetry, while a strain of deep feeling is not lacking. On the other hand, the sentimentality which extols home-life of "the arm-chair by the fire" type, or the patriotism of "The Soldiers of the Queen," is entirely absent, or, if found, is a sure sign of the invasion of the modern music-hall ballad. It is something to know that we are not the natural inheritors of this disease.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson. Friday, July 6.—Sale of Objets d'Art, China, Old Silver, Furniture, etc., including the residue of the property of the late James Staats Forbes.

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. Thursday, July 5 to Monday July 9 inclusive.—Sale of Books and Manuscript including the library of the late W. Jeeves, the library of Mr. F. S. Stevenson, and a portion of the library of the late Henry Tuke.—Monday and Tuesday, July 9 and 10. Sale of Autograph letters and historical documents, important letters and relics of the Wesley family and the desk chair used by Oliver Goldsmith.—Wednesday, July 11 to Saturday, July 14. Sale of Engravings and Etchings, historical prints and broadsides, from the collection of the late Alfred Morrison.

LITERATURE

AN ENGLISH EPIC

Drake. An English Epic. Books i.-iii. By ALFRED NOYES.
(Blackwood, 6s. net.)

IN his exordium to this poem Mr. Alfred Noyes shows himself well aware of the magnitude of the task he has undertaken. He sees as in a vision England's epic age as a theme "Worthy the great Homeric roll of song." In a note he tells us that he hopes to complete "the unattempted task" in twelve Books, of which we have an instalment of three in the volume before us. It cannot be said that in this he exaggerates at all. The Elizabethan age ranks as one of the greatest in the history of the world, and, if ever a hero deserved to be immortalised in poetry, that hero was Francis Drake. He, in very truth, won the world for England's domain, and while he was doing so the mother country brought forth "souls that have swept the spiritual seas." In the author's own words:

For round the throne of great Elizabeth
Verulam, Burleigh, Sidney, Spenser, More,
Clustered like stars, rare Jonson like the crown
Of Cassiopeia, Marlowe ruddy as Mars,
And over all those mighty hearts arose
The soul of Shakespeare brooding far and wide
Beyond our small horizons, like a light
Thrown from a vaster sun that still illumines
Tracts which the arc of our increasing day
Must still leave undiscovered, unexplored.

It will be noticed that Mr. Noyes has chosen blank verse for his medium of expression, and he manages it well. The lines themselves are at once musical and majestic, the epithets are charged with fire and colour and the tale is carried on with splendid energy. It begins in the Council Chamber of Queen Elizabeth. We see the mighty Bess in perplexity. Full of courage, her woman's heart still inclines to the subtler craft of Burleigh. She knows that Mary of Scotland is waiting for a war with Spain, and that "France o'er a wall of bleeding Huguenots watched for an hour to strike." But in the midst of her deliberation a travel-stained seaman arrives with a tale of torture by the Inquisition. He tells his story in the greatest agitation, but with the fault of too much coherency. In such circumstances we would have expected broken words and elliptical sentences, suggesting rather than telling what he had to tell. Elizabeth arrives at a swift decision:

My lords, this is the last cry they shall wring
From English lips unheeded: we will have Such remedies for this as all the world
Shall tremble at!

Meanwhile Drake is lying perdu in his London lodging nursing dreams of the Spanish Main. To him comes Walsingham, and eventually Queen Elizabeth sends for the sea-hero. The interview is most successfully described. Queen Elizabeth acts right royally, although at the time her heart was torn with her love for Leicester and the obstacle to it raised by the existence of Amy Robsart. While Drake is waiting, he hears a maid singing to her, even as David sang to Saul. This gives occasion for the introduction of one of the many beautiful lyrics that adorn the poem. We quote the first and last verses of the song:

Now the purple night is past,
Now the moon more faintly glows,
Dawn has through thy casement cast
Roses on thy breast, a rose;
Now the kisses are all done,
Now the world awakes anew,
Now the charmed hour is gone,
Let not love go, too.

Kingdoms melt away like snow,
Gods are spent like wasting flames,
Hardly the new peoples know
Their divine thrice-worshipped names!

At the last great hour of all,
When Thou makest all things new,
Father, hear Thy children call,
Let not love go, too.

The conclusion of the interview is that the queen gives Drake a private commission. He is to sail the flag of the pirate and stand alone till the end is reached, but he is promised final support and whatever gold is required. Then we have a hint of the intrigue with which these first Books are largely concerned:

But in the room
Where Drake had held his converse with the Queen
The embroidered arras moved, and a lean face,
White with its long eavesdropping upon death,
Crept out and peered as a venomous adder peers
From out dark ferns, then as the reptile flashes
Along a path between two banks of flowers
Almost too swift for sight, a stealthy form
—One of the fifty spies whom Burleigh paid—
Passed down the gold-gloomed corridor to seek
His master, whom among great books he found,
Calm, like a mountain brooding o'er the sea.

The result is that, when Drake starts for his expedition, he is accompanied by a creature of Burleigh's, Thomas Doughty, who wins his way to friendship with the great seaman and acts with more than Mephistophelian treachery. As they enter upon the Channel seas after their departure a very pretty song is introduced as sung by the seamen, of which the following is the last verse:

Beyond the light of far Cathay,
Beyond all mortal dreams,
Beyond the reach of night and day
Our Eldorado gleams,
Revealing—as the skies unfold—
A star without a stain,
The Glory of the Gates of Gold
Beyond the Spanish Main.

Doughty sows dissension among the sailors, who fight like sea-wolves whenever they meet a Spaniard, but are invaded by doubt and superstition when they think of the long voyage and its ambiguous ending. Drake's magnificent trustfulness in human nature is finely developed, as well as the meanness of the spy by whom he is accompanied. The end comes when Doughty tries to escape in Drake's ship, the Golden Hynde, and he is condemned to death. The end is historical. When his sentence is made known Doughty laughs.

Doughty laughed out and said, "Since I must die,
Let us have one more hour of comradeship,
One hour as old companions. Let us make
A feast here, on this island, ere I go Where there is no more feasting." So they made
A great and solemn banquet as the day
Decreased; and Doughty bade them all unlock
Their sea-chests and bring out their rich array.
There, by that wondering ocean of the West,
In crimson doublets, lined and slashed with gold,
In brodered lace and double golden chains
Embossed with rubies and great cloudy pearls
They feasted, gentleman adventurers,
Drinking old malmsey, as the sun sank down.

Now Doughty, fronting the rich death of day,
And flourishing a silver pouncet-box
With many a courtly jest and rare conceit,
There as he sat in rich attire, out-braved
The rest.

Finally Doughty and Drake "kissed each other, as brothers, on the cheek." Then Doughty kneeled and Drake beheaded him with the two-edged naked sword.

Our criticism on this part of the story is that it is not prepared for by the figure that Doughty cuts previously. A traitor who day by day worms himself into the confidence of his friend with the intent to betray him, who on several occasions shows the most abject cowardice, and who is neither more nor less than a spy of the worst description, could scarcely have met his end so bravely and gaily. Excepting this one fault, however, there is little but praise to be bestowed on this fine attempt to render in verse what is perhaps the most striking and pregnant epoch in the history of England.

SCHILLER IN ENGLAND

Schiller's Dramas and Poems in England. By THOMAS REA. (Unwin, 3s. 6d. net.)

THE greater part of this book is devoted to the dull task of exposing the various degrees of inaccuracy, flatness, and futility which distinguish most of the English versions of works by Schiller. English translators are a notorious race of evil-doers; but was it necessary, in investigating the influence exerted by the German dramatist on our literature, to collect evidence of all the misdemeanours which were committed in his name? We do not think so, especially as Mr. Rea, in his eager pursuit of the offenders, seems to have overlooked the main point of interest in the matter.

In appearance, Schiller is one of the few foreign poets who succeeded in altering the form and spirit of English poetry. During the first quarter of the nineteenth century he had as considerable a following in this country as he afterwards obtained in France. The forty English editions of his works and the seventy-three editions of English versions of his plays and poems are some evidence of this. And there is, besides, Hazlitt's record of the fact that for many years he converted English dramatic literature into a branch of German tragedy. Hazlitt, like Wordsworth, Coleridge and Scott, was among Schiller's admirers. "The Robbers," Hazlitt said, "stunned me like a blow. . . . The last interview in Don Carlos, I remember, gave me a deep sense of suffering, and a strong desire after good, which has haunted me ever since." In spite, however, of this, he did not attach any great literary significance to "the loud trampling of the German Pegasus on the English stage," for, after all, he concludes that, if the world were only what it pretended to be, "such extravagant and prodigious paradoxes would . . . meet with sympathy in no human breast." And, as a matter of history, "the loud trampling of the German Pegasus on the English stage," was an event of very little literary significance.

For Schiller's influence on English literature was extraordinarily ineffectual in comparison with his influence on French literature. Undoubtedly, this influence can be traced as clearly in the plays of Wordsworth and Coleridge as in the dramas and novels of Victor Hugo and his contemporaries; but in the works of the English poets the ideas of the German dramatist are not expressed with a shadow of the power and splendour with which they are set forth in the works of the French poets. In the literature of the French romantic movement these ideas are predominant. From Schiller the playwrights of the new school derived their inspiration, their art, and much of their subject-matter. In the literature of the English romantic movement, however, the influence of the author of The Robbers was a force which tended only to mislead and bring to nought the genius of the best writers. Its effect on Wordsworth is seen in The Borderers; its effect on Coleridge is seen in Osorio; its effect on other men is seen in some of the worst tragedies of Maturin, M. G. Lewis, and Sheridan Knowles. In fact, no English work, in which the spirit of Schiller is as potent as it is in Hernani and Les Misérables, is of any great literary value.

That is, we think, the main point of interest in the study of Schiller's influence on English literature. How was it that this influence dulled the genius of Wordsworth, and brightened the genius of Hugo? The question is one in regard to which it is illuminating to note that on the German poets of the romantic school also the influence of Schiller was slight and ineffectual. None of them followed him, when, after a vain attempt to found a national theatre, he led his Muse back to the Canossa of French classicism. They turned instead for fresh inspiration to the folk-songs and traditions of their own people, to the impulses of their own minds, and the passions of their own hearts. And so, at last, did the English poets. There they discovered the authentic power of intuition which Schiller lacked. For Schiller's intellect, as Carlyle acutely remarked, was systematic and scholastic rather than intuitive.

In all Schiller's earlier writings, nay, more or less in the whole of his writings [said Carlyle], this comparatively barren elevation appears as a leading characteristic. . . . He dwells on old, conventionally noble themes, never looking abroad over the many-coloured stream of life, to elucidate and ennoble it. . . . The interest turns on prescribed, old-established matters; common love-mania, passionate greatness, enthusiasm for liberty and the like.

Schiller was, in fact, a poet of the French Revolution, and, in his plays, less a poet, perhaps, than a rhetorician; as such he naturally appealed more strongly to the French writers who lived on the ideas of that Revolution, than he did to the English and German writers who were seeking for new and deeper sources of poetry. Across the sky, from which Goethe shines tranquil and clear, Schiller, like a meteor, blazed and vanished.

THE LIBER STUDIORUM

Turner's Liber Studiorum. By W. G. RAWLINSON. Second edition. (Macmillan, 20s. net.)

FOR years, collectors and others interested in Turner's "Liber Studiorum" have been awaiting the publication of the second edition of Mr. Rawlinson's catalogue; and, now it has appeared, all Liber lovers will feel a deep debt of gratitude towards the author for the admirable manner in which he has accomplished his task. The first edition appeared in 1878; and since then new facts have been brought to light, new states have been discovered, errors have been detected, modifications have been suggested, and from many sources new material has accumulated to be considered and dealt with. Now, we have the harvest of these many years of watchful work, and are intensely thankful. Mr. Rawlinson is a keen and enthusiastic amateur who has taken up the cause of the Liber with ardent devotion, and the result is no mere compilation, but a work pulsating with vigorous life from beginning to end. Of the Liber Mr. Rawlinson declares: "I believe that to all time it will be regarded as a monumental work of art, and that it will take rank with the highest productions of the greatest landscape-painter which the world has yet seen."

In the book before us Turner's "Liber Studiorum" is reconstructed, from its inception in October 1806 under the spurring influence of the Rev. Henry Trimmer, as related in an invaluable letter by the clergyman's daughter Mrs. Clara Wheeler (by the way, Thornbury in his revised edition, 1877, pp. 234, 491, refers to this letter, and to Mrs. Wheeler as a daughter of Mr. Wells, the artist, of Knockholt), right through its history, without a missing link, down to the admirable plates mezzotinted in recent years by Mr. Frank Short, A.R.A. We watch the plates as they are being engraved under the supervision of the great artist, learn the ridiculously small price paid to the engravers, go with the plates to the printer and find how many first-rate impressions can be taken, ascertain the system of publication, listen to the disagreements between Turner and his interpreters and printsellers, are told in how many states the plates appeared and the precise differences between the states, trace into whose hands the best impressions went, and discover where these best impressions are preserved at the present day. What more could be wished for in such a work? One thing would have added considerably to the value of the book. The late Henry Blackburn used to insist that the slightest outline sketch conveyed to the mind a more vivid impression of a picture than much printed description; and had Mr. Rawlinson placed such a sketch, even though it had been only the size of a postage stamp, in, say, the place occupied by the initial letter of the first paragraph of each number, he would have added much interest. Then, in turning over the leaves of the book, the collector would grasp the Liber at a glance, for the compositions of the unpublished plates are not familiar to all, while memory may deceive us in regard to others. Let any one place a postage stamp sideways in the spot indicated and judge for himself.

There has been some doubt as to which plate was engraved first. Mr. Rawlinson for several reasons considers the Bridge and Goats, aquatinted by F. C. Lewis, the premier plate, and cannot accept the "very ingenious argument" put forward by Mr. C. F. Bell in The Studio winter number of 1903. But, as Mr. Rawlinson accepts Mrs. Wheeler's letter (pp. xii.-xiii.) as conclusive evidence of the genesis of the whole work during Turner's visit to her father in October 1806, some weight should be allowed to a statement in the same letter, that "before he [Turner] left us the first five subjects which form the first number were completed and arranged for publication." These five plates were all engraved by Charles Turner and "issued January 20, 1807." The Bridge and Goats bears date "April 23, 1812." Mr. Rawlinson thinks this engraved date an error, as Turner "was never an accurate man in such matters"; but he does not cite another plate to support this view. So far as we have tested, the catalogue is very accurate; and Mr. Frank Short's technical help has been of much value. But State ii. of Plate 30 says: "No dot in 'o' of 'Athol' in title"; and State iii.: "A dot added in centre of 'o's' of 'Scotland' and 'Athol' in title." We know a state with a dot in the 'o' of 'Scotland,' but without one in the 'o' of 'Athol.' This state is either not described or is described ambiguously. On p. 192 Mr. Rawlinson tells us: "Kingston Bank has been engraved in pure mezzotint by Mr. Frank Short, A.R.A." This plate can hardly be described as "pure mezzotint," as we have recently seen two etching state impressions. In a foot-note to p. vii. of the first edition complaint was made of the exhibiting the Liber drawings at the National Gallery. "Not only are they becoming utterly faded and in other ways deteriorated by continual exposure. . . ." The drawings are still on public view and the Vaughan bequest has been added to them; but this condemnatory note has been suppressed in the present volume. Does it mean that the author has changed his views?

In the preface Mr. Rawlinson thanks only four helpers, the fourth being described as "last, but not least." But during such a number of years, in a work of this kind, many must have contributed information and assistance, and we expected to find at least an omnibus paragraph of thanks for help received. The work is a second edition; but the alterations are so extensive, the additional descriptions of the engravers' proofs so important and full, and the whole work so thoroughly revised and recast, that it is practically rewritten and virtually a new book. No Liber collector can dare to be without it, nor will any such dream of trying.

THE FROSTY CAUCASUS

Fire and Sword in the Caucasus. By LUIGI VILLARI. (Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.)

It is difficult for Englishmen to take an intelligent interest in the internal affairs of Russia, owing to the vast number of problems involved, all of which depend upon varying local circumstances, and also because comparatively few of us, even as tourists, know the country, and fewer still can speak or read the Russian language. No part of the Russian Empire is more full of interesting problems than the Caucasus, and no part is harder to understand, because of the difficulties of access and of language. Mr. Villari has already, in his "Russia Under the Great Shadow," shown that he is a keen observer and an attractive writer, and by his new book he will add considerably to his reputation. During the summer and autumn of last year he visited every important centre of political unrest in the Caucasus, and was able to interview men so differently situated as the chief of the secret police, Georgian revolutionary leaders, peasants, editors, and consuls. Even the Russian viceroy granted an audience. Mr. Villari describes him as "a man of excellent intentions and full of goodwill, but far too much of a courtier to deal with the situation"; Prince Louis Napoleon, Governor-General of Erivan, refused to be "drawn," being afraid lest his words "should get into the papers"; and finally the venerable Katholikos of Armenia received this intrepid interviewer. With time at his disposal and with advantages of this kind, it is hardly to be wondered at that Mr. Villari has been able to produce a most interesting record of his travels and impressions.

The Caucasus is, like every part of Russia, a land of contrasts; but there, where the land is inhabited by alien races, these contrasts are more than ever emphasised. East and West meet at Moscow, Nijni Novgorod, Constantinople, and a score of other places, to the joy of the tourist [and the journalist; but in the Caucasus may be found more surprises.

There writes Mr. Villari], side by side with Nationalist claims and bitter racial and religious animosities, we see attempts to realise the conceptions of Social Democracy; together with evidences of mediæval barbarism we find men actually putting the theories of Marx into practice.

In that country, where it appears that a welcome awaits the traveller, may be seen places such as the deserted town of Ani with its massive ruins and cave dwellings, inhabited to this day by Armenian and Tartar troglodytes; Mount Ararat towering above the pigmy mountains which encircle it; and, best of all, the Gurian Republic. Guria is a district of Kutais where all the peculiarities of the Georgian character are seen in their most acute development. Here for two years Social Democracy has been put in practice, and, though Tolstoy's theory of non-resistance is not accepted, the Russian writ no longer runs and gendarmes and politzmeisters are vain things. Mr. Villari was present at a sitting of the popular tribunal at Ozurgety, the capital, which, though it may be the most primitive of institutions, is so effective that the local Russian court-house is deserted. The tribunal is held in the open and is composed in a very simple way. Some two hundred people were present when Mr. Villari attended.

There are no judges, no jury, no public prosecutor, no counsel; but every person present, whether man, woman or child, native or foreign, has the right to act in any or all of these capacities, and verdict and sentence are decided by the vote of the majority. One man is elected chairman, but merely for the sake of convenience, and he has no official authority beyond what is derived from the fact that he is old and has studied in a university. Every one, according to this communistic theory, who has an opinion on the matter under discussion has the right to express it, and each vote affects the ultimate decision.

The punishments inflicted are curious, the usual form being a strict boycott for a given period. As a sort of protest against the manners and customs of Russian officials, morals are rigorously protected. A man, who had pleaded guilty to adultery, was forced with his paramour to ride through the village naked on the back of an ass: during the progress they proclaimed their sin before all the assembled villagers, declared their contrition and vowed to lead a pure life in future.

In his travels the author had to put up with many discomforts. He was nearly arrested for taking a harmless photograph on a strategic railway, and at Vladikavkaz, where he was delayed by the railway strike, he witnessed some rioting after the reception of the manifesto which was the Magna Charta of Russian freedom. A procession was organised, consisting chiefly of schoolboys, to celebrate the occasion, but some patriots of the lower classes, who had not read the manifesto, interfered. Troops arrived, shooting became general, and a student who was said to have made an anti-monarchical speech was done to death by hooligans under Mr. Villari's eyes; looting by Cossacks gave the necessary final touch. Thus was freedom celebrated at the foot of the Caucasus. Daily life, however, was generally of an uneventful description: at Tiflis, for example, he encountered an American scientist who was interested in the country solely from the point of view of bees and was going to Erivan, regardless of the Tartar-Armenian disturbances, to see a rare kind of grey bee, and to the headquarters of the Armenian church to inspect some hives of an unusual type kept by the monks.

Sympathy with the Armenians is certainly demanded of those who read the book, and with good reason, for, if protected from the Tartars, they might, with their devotion to their Church and their extraordinary love of education, become the most valuable asset in the Caucasus. The problem, however, of settling a country where there is no national unity will require all the skill of a liberal and progressive Russia.

The book is profusely illustrated with photographs, most of which were taken by the author, but has a lurid and sticky cover similar to that of Mr. Villari's last book on Russia. Mr. Villari has by no means a guide-book style, but his book on Russia had so remarkable a cover that it excited the grave suspicions of a gendarme—with a very large sword—at Kronstadt, who found it last summer in the present writer's luggage. To prevent any unpleasantness, the gendarme was told that the work was only a guide-book: the assurance was sufficient. The reviewer's conscience is salved by this confession, but the trouble was all due to the cover.

A MODERN VIEW OF THE ATONEMENT

The Christian Doctrine of Salvation. By GEORGE BARKER STEVENS, Ph.D., D.D., LL.D., Dwight Professor of Systematic Theology in Yale University. (T. & T. Clark, 12s.)

THE forensic theory of the Atonement has its commencement in St. Paul's Epistles. The theories of the other New Testament writers are quite distinct, though they have been consistently interpreted in the light of St. Paul's doctrine by Protestant theologians. Even in St. Paul's case it is evident that he is speaking in terms of Jewish legalism, partly as the result of his early training and associations, partly in order that he may refute the Pharisaic doctrine of salvation by ceremonial on its own ground. The theory, though already sufficiently elaborated in his writings to be recognised as the starting-point of its later form, is not yet made absolute, but is counterbalanced by one which has closer kinship with those of the Fourth Gospel and of the Epistle to the Hebrews in its mystical and moral character. It was on the latter lines that the doctrine first took shape in the writings of the Greek Fathers. The Crucifixion was subordinated to the life as a whole, to the Incarnation and pre-existence of the Logos. Individual salvation was conceived as effected by the mystical participation in the life, not by the imputation of the merits of the Passion. The life was appropriated by the individual as a member of that community of which Christ is the Head, by becoming assimilated to Christ in his sufferings and self-devotion. That Dr. Stevens imagines this aspect of St. Paul's teaching to have been neglected by theologians generally is due to the fact that his attention is almost exclusively directed to the developments of Protestant theology. This broader notion has always been the ruling conception of Catholicism, even when it has been rendered ineffective by the later growths of scholastic formalism.

It was indeed inevitable that the tragic and cruel death of such a being as Christ was believed to be, could not but assume sooner or later very deep significance for the Christian consciousness. But during the first five centuries the thought of the Church was mainly absorbed in the Christological speculations which led to the definition of the relations between the divine and human natures.

Theoretically, these definitions aimed at maintaining a just balance between the two, but the result of the general development of the Christian consciousness was to magnify the divinity at the expense of the humanity, a result which is very evident in the teaching of modern Roman Catholic theologians. The effect of this development upon the interpretation of Christ's death was slow in making itself felt. Anselm was the first to formulate a complete forensic theory. But it was in Protestantism that the idea of penal-substitution was elaborated in its most uncompromising form. Having overthrown the idea of the Church, with her visible means of grace, as the mystical Body of Christ whose life is shared by her members, the Reformers found it necessary to substitute something else which could strike the popular thought and feeling with graphic and pictorial effect. This was found in focussing the attention on the Crucifixion as a fact at once historical and mystical. Thus the Reformers went back to St. Paul, but not behind him. They left it to later theologians to bring to light once more the real features of Christ's humanity from behind the veil of theological dogma. Their conception of the Atonement drew its whole significance from the disproportionate growth of the idea of the divinity. But it remained for their successors, as Dr. Stevens shows, to carry the penal-substitution theory to the unreasonable and unethical results which are its logical issue. The bare statement of those results is, as he says, its most complete condemnation. And this is the course he adopts in his admirable historical summary, where the development of what he calls this "Protestant scholasticism" is traced with all the lucidity, conciseness and vigour of diction which characterise the work as a whole. In the constructive portion he considers the doctrine under its several aspects in the light of its history and states in clear terms his own theory, which is of the mystico-ethical order. He is doubtless right in saying that the development had its use in giving prominence to a certain aspect of Christ's work. But its chief value surely consists in showing that the interior dialectic of the theory inevitably leads to its own destruction.

The fresh interest which modern theology is creating in the human aspect of our Lord's life tends to destroy the false and unreal light in which his words and actions have been viewed, and thus permits the actual moral splendour of that life to manifest itself more freely. Protestantism, in fact, is completing the work of the Reformation by going back to the source, and in doing so reaches a region beyond controversy, that of ethical mysticism, which affords common ground to all Christians. This movement has not destroyed dogma as such, but has reversed the old theological method of using it, which was to measure the life and sayings of Jesus by dogmatic teaching; whereas it measures dogma by the standard of the life and teaching of Christ. Any dogma which manifestly conflicts with that moral standard is doomed to destruction, and that is why the penal-substitution theory must disappear. Our view of this theory, our view of theology in general, depends, as Dr. Stevens says, upon our fundamental idea of God. The penal-substitution theory makes God punish the innocent in the place of the guilty, which is immoral, or makes him repent in the sinner's stead, which is impossible. It brings God's attributes of mercy and justice into antagonism, and subordinates the former as optional to the latter as essential, being thus in direct conflict with the harmony of those attributes by which, in the Prophets and Evangelists, righteousness is manifested in mercy and love is the highest expression of divinity.

And Dr. Stevens goes to the root of the matter when he says that the revolution which is being accomplished in theology is due far more to the increased emphasis laid upon the divine immanence than to historical or Biblical criticism.

There are several points in the book which, did space permit, might furnish matter for criticism. But, as these do not seriously affect the main argument, it is not necessary to do more than take note of the most important. The author seems to assume throughout the volume the historicity of at least the greater portion of the Fourth Gospel, and his argument on page 98 against the sacramental interpretation of John vi. depends entirely upon the truth of this view. Without entering into the question whether such a view may be considered critically sound, it must be pointed out that at this stage of the controversy, it is impossible to found arguments upon it as if it were universally acknowledged.

THE MERRY HEART

Felicity in France. By CONSTANCE ELIZABETH MAUD. (Heinemann, 6s.)

WHEN a stern closing of the consciousness to the fact that cleaner, cooler worlds exist is the one thing to make life endurable in this hot and dusty city, is it fair that Felicity, her aunt and her Gertruda, should be allowed to storm the carefully erected barrier of self-defence? The attack is irresistible; we can only capitulate, and wander, willing captives, through the flowery meads of France, to return to the realities of life with the murmur of the sea of Concarneau in our ears and the songs of the Félibres in our hearts. And Aunt Anne—was there ever such a travelling companion? A grandmother, but a grandmother who must be chaperoned. She is "slight and active, even to the point of athletic, her hair is dark, with a gun-metal shade, and curls crisply all over her head. Her eyes dance with mischief on occasions, notably on solemn occasions, like a school-boy's." She is, in fact, "a curious compound of an abnormally intelligent and active boy of sixteen and an exceedingly dignified, stately, and somewhat sarcastic little lady of sixty." Small wonder that Felicity accepts the onerous position of chaperon with a light heart. Small wonder, also, that, after losing her aunt and finding her again; in the sea at Trouville; arm-in-arm with a strange Mayor at Concarneau; in furious altercation with an atheist tourist at Tours; battling with her unwieldy purchases (a woolly lamb, a shawl, a pair of shoes, four white ducks, two black turkeys and a tea-set), in the market at Chinon, Felicity lifts up her voice and cries: "It is not one chaperon you need, Aunt Anne, it is a body-guard!" Aunt Anne fascinates every one, from the fat notary of Chenonceau to the gentle nuns at Chinon. Particularly interesting, just now, is the description of the convent life and the picture of the attitude of the lower classes towards MM. Combes, Pelletan, and the rest. Miss Maud has a full and sympathetic appreciation of the Breton fisherman. With what Stevenson called "his unflinching recognition of his own luck" combined with his deeply mystic side, he will always be an alluring study. The French child we have met before in Miss Maud's pages: it is as precocious and un-English as ever; but we make some delightful new friends as well: the old lady at Quimperlé; the distracted waiter-chambermaid at Blois; the old Grandmère at Tours; last but not least, the little German maid, Gertruda, beloved of chefs and chauffeurs and distinctly un-German in her pronounced views on matrimony. To the saintly Archevêc, le père du peuple, we cannot attempt to do justice here. Suffice it to say that we have met with no more charming figure since the immortal "Sylvestre Bonnard" of M. Anatole France.

The reader must turn for himself to these enchanting pages. If he does not feel the charm of Felicity's progress through Mistral's Provence, he is to be pitied. Avignon, the home of Petrarch's Laura; Arles, so nearly the capital of Constantine's Roman Empire, the birthplace of the "Ecole du Lion" and the Félibres, the shrine, for so long, of the famous Venus; Paradou, the home of Charloun, the peasant poet; Marlotte, where Murger wrote his "Vie de Bohême" and Barbizon, Millet's Barbizon; Felicity visits all these and does homage to them in her graceful fashion. Balzac's house at Bourron she passes; "not an inspiring dwelling, but constructed on the dull, plain pattern of a chest of drawers." No wonder she and Aunt Anne, the latter the heroine of a "chasse à sanglier" and proud possessor of a pair of tusks, turn their backs upon Fair France with such heavy hearts. The book loses nothing by the fact that Miss Maud has to some extent dropped the tediously literal translation from the French, which figured largely in her earlier work; a curious language savouring more of the "Franc-ingle" and "Ingle-franc" of Dumauiet's "Peter Ibbetson" than of any known tongue. Miss Maud dedicates her book to Frédéric Mistral, and, indeed, she does full justice to the land he loves.

A LOVE-STORY OF THE EAST

Laili and Majnun. Translated from Nizami by J. ATKINSON. Edited by L. CRANMER-BYNG. (The Orient Press, Probsthain & Co., 5s.)

IT is only within the last fifty years that we have "heard the East a-calling" with any real appreciation. Before Mr. Quaritch received, in 1868, a certain bundle of translations of Persian quatrains, Oriental study was the occupation of the learned and the specialist. Nor was the change rapid; all the world knows of the five-shilling "Omar" reduced to the penny box. But it is from FitzGerald's translation that may be traced the rise of the present general avidity for scraps of Eastern wisdom and descriptions of Oriental countries. There had, of course, been isolated instances of popularity achieved by tales of the East; putting aside the Arabian Nights, there was Moore's "Lalla Rookh"; but, after all, that was the work of a Western poet who had already made his name. It may have been the interest aroused by this poem which led a certain James Atkinson, between 1830 and 1837, to translate one of the great epic poems of Nizami, and give to the world a version of "Laili and Majnun." A reprint of this poem, edited by Mr. Cranmer-Byng, forms the first of a series of "Love Stories of the East."

It is probably better to have any version of a fine thing than none; but we wish that Mr. Cranmer-Byng had given us a new translation of his own, for James Atkinson was essentially a son of his period, and the glowing Persian story is told with all the finicking precision of a "pretty" age, when "sensibility" was the vogue and real emotion was rare. We should like to accept the generous estimate of Atkinson's work contained in the introduction, but the fatal, unconscious appeals made to our sense of humour are against this. We follow with interest the account of Laili and Kais growing up together, and of the charms of the Arab girl as she left childhood behind. We perceive that Kais will fall in love with her: and then, in four lines, he does so, and Tumultuous passion danced upon his brow.

When we have recovered from the dance, we are interested again; Laili is separated from her Kais, who goes mad with grief, and is therefore known afterwards as Majnun. His father demands for him the hand of Laili, but her parent will have no madman for a son-in-law: and all appear to overlook the fact that the cause of madness would be removed with the wedding. Several attempts to console him having failed, Majnun flies to the wilderness where his madness has unchecked sway. There he remains for many years, his only companions the beasts of the desert, who form his guard. News comes to him of Laili's marriage to a prosperous merchant, followed by a message from her that she is still true in her soul. She even asks him to go and see her; but at the last moment her courage fails her, and she will not see him. The impression we have of Laili, perhaps due to Atkinson's stilted verse, is that she derived a sort of pensive pleasure from the fact that she was the heroine of a real love-story; and this impression remains even after the lady's exclamation:

Worse than a thousand madmen now I feel.

In due time her husband dies, and she sends for Majnún; the lovers meet for the first time after long years of sorrow. They sit silent together, till Lailí finds voice. Then the real tragedy occurs; the joy has come too late for Majnún; and even while he gazes into the familiar face madness comes upon him, and, tearing off his festival robes, he breaks away to the desert again. Lailí droops and dies, soon followed by Majnún. The poet has a vision of them united in a very Mohammedan heaven, but it is their lives on earth that hold our attention. In spite of the faults of translation—faults which it is not fair to blame on Mr. Atkinson, but on his age—the tragedy is poignant. It is the eternal story of Romeo and Juliet, common to all climes and all ages, and here and there it has so affected the translator that he rises above his conventions and becomes direct and convincing.

A WOMAN AT WATERLOO

A Week at Waterloo in June 1815. Lady DE LANCEY's narrative. Edited by Major B. R. WARD, R.E. (Murray, 6s.)

To criticise a narrative, which, though it has remained in manuscript for more than eighty years, has received the unstinted praise of Dickens and Scott, would be an impertinence, and to add to their words of praise would certainly be a rash attempt to paint the lily. The two great novelists write of Lady De Lancey's tale of suffering in different ways. Sir Walter Scott had never read anything, so he wrote, which affected his feelings more strongly. Dickens, in a very characteristic letter, wrote: "It is a striking proof of the power of that most extraordinary man Defoe that I seem to recognise in every line of the narrative something of him." And then, after writing of the story with an earnestness which "pen and ink can no more convey than toast and water," he says: "You won't smile at this, I know. When my enthusiasms are awakened by such things they don't wear out." The story itself is so sad that its publication seems, even after a length of time, to be almost an intrusion into the privacy of the widow's sorrow. Sir William, married only six weeks before the campaign began, died nine days after the battle of Waterloo, where he was wounded by a spent cannon-ball. The first six weeks of the marriage had been very happy. Napoleon had landed from Elba, and Wellington, in forming his staff, insisted on having De Lancey appointed as his Quartermaster-General, although the officer really entitled to the post was Sir Hudson Lowe. The young bride accompanied her husband to the Continent, stayed with him at Brussels, was despatched to Antwerp, and thence, after an agony of waiting, enhanced by contradictory news, she was taken to Waterloo, by which time, she says, she had almost lost recollection with the excess of anxiety and suspense.

When I went into the room where he lay, he held out his hand and said, "Come Magdalene, this is a sad business, is it not?" I could not speak, but sat down by him and took his hand. This was my occupation for six days.

The pathos of the story and the simple way in which it is told are shown in those few sentences. Dickens showed in what way the details of the narrative might have been told in fiction by "that most extraordinary man, Defoe." He added:

Of all the beautiful and tender passages—the thinking every day how happy and blest she was—the decorating him for the dinner—the standing in the balcony at night and seeing the troops melt away through the gate—and the rejoining him on his sickbed—I say not a word. They are God's own, and should be sacred.

But Dickens himself could not increase the intensity of those words: "This was my occupation for six days." There is one passage which must be quoted to show that the narrative is not entirely one of sorrow:

He [Sir William De Lancey] went twice to the Duke's; the first time he found him standing looking over a map with a Prussian General, who was in full-dress uniform—with orders and crosses, etc., the Duke was in his chemise and slippers, preparing to dress for the Duchess of Richmond's ball; the two figures were quite admirable. The ball took place notwithstanding the reveillé played through the streets the whole night. Many of the officers danced, and then marched in the morning. About two, Sir William went again to the Duke and he was sleeping sound.

It should be added that Major Ward, the editor, contributes an introduction which, together with the notes by Mr. T. W. Brogden, supply all that is necessary to make the story clear.

FOUR SONGS

(AFTER THE JAPANESE)

I

SCARLET the woods,
Royally robed,
Rich with red gold;—
But dim mine eyes,
Grey-veiled with tears.

II

Is it the music of nightingales' songs
Or thy voice?
The soft murmuring of wind through the pines
Or thy steps?
Only the sound of falling tears, for no more
Wilt thou return.

III

As cries parched earth for rain,
As birds await the dawn,
Cherry-blossom the spring,
So I for thy coming.

IV

Far off the waves beat,
As heart throbs to heart,
But wide seas sunder
Thy dead heart from mine.

AUSTRALIAN COPYRIGHT

WITH the proclamation of the Australian Commonwealth Copyright Act, 1905, a new system of law is introduced throughout Australasia. It seems at first sight to be regrettable that any part of the British Empire should anticipate the Mother Country in a measure of reform which was admitted to be inevitable nearly thirty years ago. It has the look of another example of "the tail wagging the dog." But we have good reason to be thankful for small mercies in copyright reform, and the Australian Act may prove useful in forcing the hand of the home authorities. Ostensibly based on the Monkswell Literary and Artistic Bills in the form in which they left the House of Lords in 1900, the Australian Act integrally possesses an altogether exceptional importance for a Colonial measure. The Act owes its origin to the failure of the laws of the various individual colonies to provide a workable system of protection for copyright property. Secure in the face of the difficulty of reprisals, the dramatic and literary pirate has made Australasia a happy hunting-ground.

It has never been disputed that it is competent to colonial legislatures to pass local laws limited to works first produced in the colony, and, obviously, the prevention of piracy and the imposition of penalties are matters within their purview. The Australian Commonwealth in framing its new Act upon the English Bills, with some few alterations, has shown an enterprising spirit, and has achieved something more than a merely domestic system. Sooner or later, a code which must be in many respects identical with the new Act must come into force throughout the Empire. The integrity of Imperial Copyright was never endangered by the measure, and is abundantly safeguarded. An altogether unnecessary amount of alarm appears to have been caused in some quarters as to the effect of the Act upon our international obligations, but we do not think that there is much ground for anxiety. It may be questioned, indeed, whether, considered as a measure to protect native labour against the rivalry of aliens, the Act goes as far as it was deliberately intended to do.

The Act confers upon all those who are entitled to come under its provisions many solid advantages. The range of copyright law is widened. Abridgment, translation, and dramatisation are, for the first time in any British enactment, included in copyright. No doubt the construction of the various sections in point will occasion the usual difficulties. We may expect any number of hair-splitting distinctions between "abridgments" which are not "copies" and "dramatisations" which are not infringements. But nevertheless the new departure will be hailed by many people as a distinct advance. Definitions are, no doubt, as somebody once said, "dangerous things" and "pirated books" as "a reproduction of a book, made in any manner without the authority of the owner of the copyright in the book" seem to comprise only actual "copies." If so, it is only to such copies that the prohibition against importation or the right of search and seizure applies. But it must be left to the Australian Courts to construe the Act intelligently. It may be questioned whether any pirate will have the audacity to test the question whether an abridged piratical version can be imported and sold with impunity. Nor will many vendors be anxious to settle the point whether anything they are offering for sale is a "pirated book" within the meaning of section 50, subsec. (a).

The Act bristles with remedies, many of which are new in any British Court. Thus the copyright in a book; the performing right in dramatic or musical work; the lecturing right in a lecture (now first created); the copyright in an artistic work, are surrounded with a network of practical protection sufficient to deter the most determined malefactor. As well as the sale, the distribution or importation of any pirated book or artistic work is punishable by a fine not exceeding five pounds a copy. Similarly a remedy is given against the proprietor, tenant, or occupier of a theatre in the case of the performance of any dramatic or musical work in infringement of the owner's rights, and he, if ignorant, must show that he could not have ascertained the ownership with reasonable care. Penalties are, moreover, recoverable in a Court of Summary jurisdiction. This inaugurates a remedy which has been long clamoured for by the dramatic profession and is here adapted from the provisions of the Monkswell Bill. The right of search and seizure in the case of pirated books or artistic works is also new, and, if drastically exercised, will provide the police with plenty of work. Pirates are likely to have a short shrift if the owner or his agent can lodge a request at a police station and the offence can be dealt with out of hand like an ordinary case of larceny and without the wearisome business of applications for an injunction or actions for damages. This is reform on practical lines and the working of the penal sections of the Act will be narrowly watched.

The "manufacturing clause" is comprehensive, if somewhat cryptic. It runs:

Copyright shall subsist in every book, whether the author is a British subject or not, which has been printed from type set up in Australia or plates made therefrom or from plates or negatives made in Australia in cases where type is not necessarily used, and has, after the commencement of this Act, been published in Australia, before or simultaneously with its first publication elsewhere.

Doubtless the clause will receive that local elucidation which is desirable, but it may be remarked that a book can be photographed, and the cases dispensing with type seem to be capable of indefinite expansion. The exceptions to the clause are obviously the most important part of the Statute so far as authors outside the Commonwealth are concerned. Now, fortunately, these are free from doubt. All British works are expressly excepted, and all works published in Great Britain or on British territory simultaneously with their first publication. These are excepted as now entitled under the Imperial Acts to protection in Australia. All works published within the Union are similarly protected under the International Copyright Act, 1886. All these can, therefore, be protected in the Australian Commonwealth without any formality whatever, reliance being had on the Imperial law. But, if recourse is desired to the remedies of the Act, alien, like British authors, must register under Part vi. section 62, and make deposit of copies. This, it is said, imposes a condition upon Unionist authors which is not in strict accordance with the Berne Convention, since it is the spirit and intention of the Convention to secure for the citizens of all signatory states the benefit of local laws without other formalities than those of the country of origin: but the International Copyright Act, 1886, simply promises the protection afforded by the Imperial law throughout all British possessions. American books, which are regarded as aimed at by the clause, can clearly still secure protection through British copyright. With the remedies the better opinion appears to be that authors who comply with the conditions of the Act will enjoy its enlarged rights. It is, no doubt, an innovation for a British author to find himself possessed of privileges in the Australian Commonwealth which are denied to him at home. To be able to take summary action for the dramatisation of a novel, which is not an offence at English law, will be a novel experience. Piratical plays will soon be at a discount in Australia.

The Act presents many aspects which tempt criticism. As well as the term of the Act of 1842, many of the old phrases of the Imperial law have been preserved notwithstanding the disputes to which they have given rise. The dramatic rights dealt with by the Act wholly ignore the statutory right in an unpublished play conferred upon the author by the Dramatic Copyright Act of 1838, as soon as it has been composed. The provision that the Common Law of England shall apply throughout the Commonwealth to unpublished works, is, therefore, inoperative so far as dramatic pieces are concerned, since 3 Will. IV. c. 15 would govern. It has, again, been remarked that the new registration system applies only to Australia, and that an Australian author who desires to secure protection in Great Britain or other parts of the Empire must register at Stationers' Hall, London. This is incorrect. It is already provided that local registration shall be equivalent to Imperial registration, and there is no option in the matter where a local system exists. The analogy between the new registration system and that now in force in England is, at least, convenient, although both might be conveniently made compulsory and a condition precedent to copyright. The Act, like all copyright enactments, is a compromise, but it marks a step forward.

THE ELEVENTH MUSE

IN the closing years of the last century I held the position of a publisher's hack. Having failed in everything except sculpture, I became publisher's reader and adviser. It was the age of the "dicky dongs," and, of course, I only advised the publication of deciduous literature and books which dealt with the history of decay. The business unfortunately closed before my plans were materialised, but we had a really brilliant series of works prepared for an ungrateful public. A cheap and abridged edition of Gibbon was to have heralded the "Ruined Home" Library, as we only dealt with the decline and fall of things and eschewed motley in both senses of the word. Bad Taste in All Ages (twelve volumes, edited by myself) would have rivalled some of Mr. Sidney Lee's monumental undertakings. It was a memory of these unfulfilled designs which turned my thoughts to an old note-book—the skeleton of what was destined never to be a book in being.

I have often wondered why no one has ever tried to form an anthology of bad poetry. It would, of course, be easy enough to get together a dreary little volume of unreadable and unsaleable song. There are, however, certain stanzas so exquisite in their unconscious absurdity that an inverted immortality may be claimed for them. It is essential that their authors should have been serious, because parody and light verse have been carried to such a state of perfection that a tenth muse has been created—the muse of Mr. Owen Seaman, Mr. St. John Hankin and the author who conceals a delightful identity under the nom de guerre of "The Belgian Hare." When the Anakim, men of old which were men of renown, Shelley, Keats or Tennyson, become playful, I confess to a feeling of nervousness: the unpleasant hot sensation you experience when a distinguished man makes a fool of himself. Rossetti—I suppose from his Italian origin—was able to assume the motley without loss of dignity, and that wounded Titan, the late Mr. W. E. Henley, was another exception. Both he and Rossetti had the faculty of being foolish or obscene in verse without impairing the high seriousness of their superb poetic gifts.

But I refer to more serious folly—that of the disciples of Silas Wegg. Some friends of mine in the country employed a ladies' maid with literary proclivities. She was never known to smile; the other servants thought her stuck up; she was a great reader of novels, poetry and popular books on astronomy. One day she gave notice, departed at the end of a month, left no address, and never applied for a character. Beneath the mattress of her bed was found a manuscript of poems. One of these, addressed to our satellite, is based on the scientific fact (of which I was not aware until I read her poem) that we only see one side of the moon. The ode contains this ingenious stanza:

Oh, beautiful moon!
When I gaze on thy face
Careering among the boundaries of space
The thought has often come to my mind
If I ever shall see thy glorious behind.

It was my pleasure to communicate this verse to our greatest living conversationalist—a point I mention because it may, in consequence, be already known to those who, like myself, enjoy the privileges of his inimitable talk. I possess the original manuscript of the poem and can supply copies of the remainder to the curious.

In a magazine managed by the physician of a well-known lunatic asylum I found many inspiring examples. The patients are permitted to contribute: they discuss art and literature, subject, of course, to a stringent editorial discretion. As you might suppose, poetry occupies a good deal of space. It was from that source of clouded English I culled the following:

His hair is red and blue and white,
His face is almost tan,
His brow is wet with blood and sweat,
He steals from where he can;
And looks the whole world in the face,
A drunkard and a Man.

I think we have here a Henley manqué. In robustious assertion you will not find anything to equal it in the hospital rhymes of that author. I was so much struck by the poem that I obtained permission to correspond with the poet. I discovered that another Sappho might have adorned our literature—that a mute inglorious Elizabeth Barrett had been kept silent on Darien: for the asylum was in the immediate vicinity of the Peak in Derbyshire. Of the correspondence which ensued I will only venture to quote one sentence: "I was brought up to love beauty; my home was more than cultured, it was refined; we took in the Art Journal regularly."

Of all modern artists, I suppose that Sir Edward Burne-Jones has inspired more poetry than any other. A whole school of Oxford poets emerged from his fascinating palette, and he is the subject of one of the most exquisite of the Poems and Ballads, the "Dedication," which forms the colophon to that revel of rhymes. I sometimes think that is why his art is out of fashion with modern painters, who may inspire dealers but would never inspire poets. For who could write a sonnet on some uncompromising piece of realism by Mr. Rothenstein, Mr. John or Mr. Orpen? Theirs is an art which speaks for itself. But Sir Edward Burne-Jones seems to have dazzled the undergrowth of Parnassus no less than the higher slopes. In a long and serious epic called "The Pageant of Life," dealing with every conceivable subject, I found:

With some the mention of Burne-Jones
Elicits merely howls and groans;
But those who know each inch of art
Believe that he can bear his part.

I don't remember what he could bear. Perhaps it referred to his election at the Royal Academy. Then, again, in a "Vision" of the next world a poet described how:

Byron, Burne-Jones and Beethoven
Charlotte Brontë and Chopin are there.

I wonder if this has escaped the eagle eye of Mr. Clement Shorter. But perhaps the most delightful nonsense, for which I fear this great painter is partly responsible, is to be found in a recent poem addressed to the memory of Simeon Solomon.

More of Rossetti? Yes:
you follow'd than Burne-Jones,
Your depth of colour his than that of monochromes!
Yes; amber lilies poured, I say,
A joy for thee, than poet's bay.

But while true art refines and often stimulates—ART does, at times, I say, sit grief within our gates!
Art causes men to weep at times—
If you may heed these falt'ring rhymes.

A small volume of lyrics once sent to me for review afforded another flower for my garland:

Where in the spring time leaves are wet,
Oh lay my love beneath the shades.
Where men remember to forget,
And are forgot in Hades.

But I have given enough examples for what would form Part I. of the English anthology. Mr. Churton Collins should, of course, write a preface, because he would give us the origin of all these verses and might point out to us where the prosody was wrong, and the metaphors mixed. He might ably insist, not for the first time, on the disastrous results of neglecting the study of English literature at the Universities, or of studying it too much. Instruction would thus be combined with amusement, and I always think that is the chief use of an anthology.

Part II. would consist of really bad verses from really great poetry :

Auspicious Reverence, Hush all meaner song is one of the most pompously stupid lines in English poetry. Arnold did not hesitate to quote instances from Shakespeare :

Till that Bellona's bridegroom, lapp'd in proof,
Confronted him with self-comparisons.

You would have to sacrifice Browning, because it might fairly be concluded—well, anything might be concluded about Browning. Byron is, of course, a mine. Arthur Hugh Clough is, perhaps, the "flawless numskull," as, I think, Mr. Swinburne calls him. Tennyson surpassed :

A Mr. Wilkinson a clergyman, in many of his serious poems.

To travellers indeed the sea,
Must always interesting be,

I have heard ascribed to Wordsworth ; but wrongly I believe. I should, of course, exclude from the collection living writers. Only the select dead would be requisitioned. They cannot retort. And the entertaining volume would illustrate that curious artistic law—the survival of the unfittest, of which we are only dimly beginning to realise the significance. It is like the immortality of the invalid, now recognised by all men of science. You see it manifested in the plethora of memoirs. All new books not novels are about great dead men by unimportant little living ones. When I am asked, as I have been, to write recollections of certain "people of importance," as Dante says, I feel the force of that law very keenly.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

PREHISTORIC GHOSTS

SOME years ago M. d'Assier, in L'homme posthume, propounded a theory about pre-historic ghosts. There were plenty of recent ghosts; mediæval or classical ghosts were known, but were few in number; nobody, however, had been fortunate enough to encounter, say, a ghost of the old stone age and question him regarding "the manner of primitive man." How was this to be explained? M. d'Assier explained it by saying that ghosts, as time went on, grew thinner and thinner, until finally they disappeared altogether like a blown-out candle flame. This was a comforting doctrine, because, as De Quincey's clever brother put it, it would be nothing short of disastrous for the existing human race if an army of all the ghosts of all the dead were to league together against it. Most savages, however, believe that they have several souls or ghosts which survive death. Pre-historic man may have been no less richly endowed, and, if he were, one of his souls may have lingered to modern days on the survival of the fittest principle. For pre-historic ghosts, though rare, are not quite unknown. A quite authentic one, visible as certain mysterious lights, haunts a bridge near Melfort in Lorne. There, "long ago, in the morning of the world," its owner's body was buried in a cist with his knees tucked up to his chin, and there his skeleton was found, explaining the presence of the lights to everybody's satisfaction. Unfortunately, the lights (or the ghosts) were uncommunicative, or certain lacuna in our information about early man in Britain might have been filled up. There was a tradition—possibly handed down from generation to generation in the district from the date of the event—that the owner of the lights had been murdered. Neolithic and bronze-age ghosts still haunt their barrows and still scare the unsophisticated peasantry in the regions where these barrows abound. Weird tales are told how the barrow-dweller, the hog-boy of the Scandinavians, forced to single combat the intruder upon his bones or his treasure. Alas, the records of scientific tumulus-exploration are destitute of such thrilling encounters! But many ghosts (like fairies), especially Irish ghosts, still preserve the manners and beliefs of the stone age, and are easily disconcerted by any one who has the presence of mind to flourish before them anything made of iron and steel. Those who are flurried, or who do not possess a piece of iron, are liable to be killed by the ghost, like poor Pat Doyle in one of Mr. Curtin's Killarney folk-tales.

Man arrived at the idea of a ghost, spirit, or soul through dreams, through consideration of the phenomena of sleep, death, breathing, the existence of the shadow or reflection. This is an obvious enough origin for the animistic philosophy. Less obvious, perhaps, to the scientific mind is the idea that early man may have been moved to think he was not wholly dust by the appearance of phantasms coincidental with death. These are quite well known to psychical researchers and to readers of the works of Mr. Gurney and Mr. Myers. Granting the reality of such phantasms, when did they begin to appear? Or not granting it, when did man first begin to be hallucinated in this way? Information is scarce, as the French lady said of heaven. But, if we may judge from popular tales and sagas, which are certainly not things of yesterday, the experience has been known universally for a very long time. It is not only psychical researchers who know of coincidental phantasms; they are quite well known to the folk, who have been telling stories about them round the fire for generations. And, indeed, many of the things which are universally and firmly grounded in folk-belief—corpse-lights, strange noises, are something more than mere death portents, as they are held to be; in many cases they are seen or heard coincidentally with the death of a relation or friend of the seer or hearer. Thus for generations the peasantry have gone on believing in phantasms, appearances, manifestations coincident with death à distance. We are still a long way from pre-historic or primitive man, even if it be conceded that the ineradicable beliefs of the peasant, unchanging through change of dynasties and creeds, are descended in a direct line from quite primitive beliefs.

We turn, therefore, to the savage, who is a strong believer in ghosts of all kinds, "spiritual" manifestations, demonic influences, and whose life is usually filled with abject fear on account of them. Negro or Carib, Polynesian or Australian, he goes "softly all his days" for fear of disturbing ghosts whose temper seems to have become more irritable than when they were in the flesh. Have they any narratives of coincidental phantasms? Most observers of savages have been but little interested in psychical research; consequently, such narratives are few in number. But as they are generally casually reported they may be considered "honest Injun," authentic native tales unaffected by any personal bias of the observer's. Admiral Fitzroy reports the case of Jemmy Button, the Fuegian. At sea, on board the "Beagle," Jemmy told how, during the night, a man came to the side of his hammock and whispered to him that his father was dead. He fully believed that this was the case, and, in fact, his father had died about that time. Here is a Maori instance, related by Mr. Shortland. A party of native hunters were seated round their camp fire in the open at night. Suddenly two of them saw the figure of a relative, who had been kept ill at home, approach them. The "apparition" was invisible to the others, and at once vanished on their uttering a cry of surprise. "When they returned to the village they inquired for the sick man, and then learned that he had died about the time he was said to have been seen." Another Maori instance is cited, on the authority of Mr. F. D. Denton, in "Phantasms of the Living." Two men, assisted by a native, were cutting timber in a very lonely part of the country, away from all human habitation. While so engaged the native exclaimed: "What are you come for?" and, on being questioned as to his meaning, said he was speaking to his brother, whom he saw behind one of the Englishmen. He was visible to the Maori alone, and suddenly vanished. The Maori said he would go home—that his brother must be dead. The others laughed at him, saying his brother had been quite well on the previous Sunday. But he persisted in his intention, and, on leaving home, was met by people who told him that his brother was dead. Similar cases are also reported by that model of what all anthropologists should be, Mr. Man, as occurring from time to time among the Andamanese. Further investigation on these lines among savages will probably be productive of other instances, if discreetly pursued. Thus peoples so widely separated as the Andamanese, the Fuegians and the Maoris believe firmly in coincidental phantasms. Their belief is real, whether the appearances are unreal or not. But the belief did not cause the appearance or the hallucination or the coincidence. Even if there are many cases which were not coincidental, where there was an appearance apart from a death (and savages, though great ghost-fearers, are not great ghost-seers), this need not discredit the reality of the coincidental cases, unless, indeed, we assume, unnecessarily, that the savages "lied pleasantly," like Mendez Pinto. On the contrary, they were much affected and were not to be persuaded that their relatives were not dead.

But coincidental phantasms are not the only phenomena of the X region occurring among savages. There is hardly a matter which has been investigated by the S.P.R. to which parallels could not be produced from the lower races. Séances are held among Red Indians, Australians and Maoris, and the spirits "manifest" by speaking in a whistling kind of voice. The dead are believed to come to the living, in dreams or otherwise, to comfort or to warn them against coming danger, or they appear to the dying to call them to the spirit-land. The poltergeist is known, and trance utterance, with messages from the dead, is customary. These things may be fond imaginations on the part of savages, delusions, frauds, or lies. The curious and unexplained thing is that they occur precisely in the same way among civilised men, and have been done so throughout historic times. If they are real, they are most interesting; if they are unreal, if they are delusions, they still are fascinating. Why should savages, cultured Greeks and Egyptians long ago, and modern Europeans, ignorant peasants and educated citizens, all be deluded in the same way? Here are some examples of these happenings among savages. When a good Haida Indian is about to die, he sees a canoe manned by some of his dead friends, who come with the tide to welcome him to their domain. They are held to be sent by the god of Death. A similar belief is found among the seafaring Celts of Brittany and the Western Highlands. Such things also happen in Australia. A Maneroo black fellow related that during the night he had seen his father, his father's friend and an unrecognised female spirit. They told him he would die next day and that they would wait for him. This is a usual occurrence preceding the death of a black fellow. The death might be explained, however, through nervous fear following upon the (dream) announcement, just as savages frequently die when they discover that they have unconsciously broken a tabu, the penalty for which is death. But civilised men like Lord Lyttelton have died at the time predicted by the "ghost." Here is an affecting Australian instance of the spirit giving comfort. An old man of the Chepara tribe said with much feeling that his little daughter had appeared to him in sleep the night after her death, and once, when he was ill, he felt her near him. Her presence caused him to sleep soundly, and next morning he was better. This instance is almost Tennysonian:

Thro' a lattice on the soul
Looks thy fair face and makes it still.

The Australian blacks are not commonly credited with much sentiment, but the truth is that they have a good deal of it. They also believe that the dead forewarn them of danger. A man of the Mukjarawaint tribe said that his father had come to him in a dream and told him that he must look out for himself, else he would be killed. Soon after, he came to the place which he had seen in his dream and immediately ran off, so that his enemies did not catch him. Spirit-rappings and the poltergeist occur among many widely separated savage people—African and West Indian Negroes, the Sea Dyaks, Chinese Tartars, and Red Indians. Thus the head-hunting Sea Dyaks believe that, until they procure a head, the spirit of their latest dead relation will haunt the house, making its presence known by rappings. But the unappeased ghost in British Columbia is more energetic. He disturbs his friends by continual unseemly scratchings and knockings until his bones are disinterred and buried afresh, clad in new robes and garments—a disgusting and expensive process for the living, who, however, are anxious to have peace at any price. Spirit séances used to be common in Red Indian medicine-lodges and among the Maoris; they occur still with the Australians and Melanesians. With the last we have something exactly like table-tilting. The spirit of a dead warrior intimates his presence thus. Several men sit in a canoe in still water with paddles uplifted. The names of several "tindalos," spirits of the dead, are then called over. At the name of the dead warrior the canoe will shake violently, thus establishing his reputation as a spirit-helper to the living, who thereupon go raiding. Finally corpse-cradles, so common in the Highlands (the writer heard of one which was seen quite recently), and other strange lights during occult manifestations—"rudimentary visual phantasms"—are known to the Eskimo, the Red Indians and Indian peasants, as they were to ancient Greeks and Scandinavians.

Our list of savage spooks might easily be extended. Enough has been said to show that savage, European peasant, and cultivated twentieth-century people, like cultivated Greeks long ago, find themselves in presence of the same occult phenomena, or, if this is to beg the question, are affected in precisely the same way and believe the same things about communications from the dead. Obviously, there is something universal in all this, the working of some faculty which is common to all men everywhere. If so, then it must have been shared by pre-historic man, especially as it is so common among savages who, presumably, are like pre-historic man in their ways of thought and their manner of belief. Delusion or reality, hallucination false or veridical, the more universal it is, the further back must we seek its beginnings among men. And it may therefore be justly claimed as having helped to establish the universal belief in a spirit or soul or other self in man. The time arrived, after long ages perhaps, that, like M. Jourdain, man found he had been all along possessed of a soul with knowing it. Henceforth he "believed in soul, was very sure of God." Pre-historic man "saw things," as the Highlander would say. And these "things" were in the same tale with the ghosts and occult happenings of savage and European.

FICTION

Clemency Shafto. By FRANCES BURMESTER. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THERE are good things in Miss Burmester's latest book, notably the descriptions of Brussels and the description of a thunderstorm: the actual plot, too, is handled with skill, and the plot is a good one in some respects. But the book as a whole is a disappointment. Great issues are at stake, great questions are raised, and the point of view from which they are treated is out of all proportion small—small as a pin's head. A sense of sin predominates, and the characters are forced to fit into its little compass; and in the process they become depressingly unreal. Lady Polesdown, when she was very young, made the mistake of marrying a fool and loving a knave, and when the story opens she is shown as a clever woman of the world with a brilliant daughter, whom she does not like, and forty years, which she likes even less. She is talking with the knave, whom she has met, after twenty years, for the first time, in Brussels, and the knave leaves her after a stormy scene to die in the Bois. Knowing what she knows of her daughter's birth and what she alone can know, it is almost incredible that she should have stayed on in Brussels and allowed John Darenth, the knave's son, to meet her daughter. But he does meet her and falls in love with her and she with him. That part of the story, however, is so cleverly manipulated that it is at least made to appear credible. After it, the story falls to pieces. We are expected to sympathise with the woman's full and cruel confession, and to be moved by what is called her repentance; whereas we can only execrate her stupidity and marvel at her weakness. The whole position, instead of being tragic, becomes ridiculous under the roseate hues of sentiment which are cast relentlessly upon it. The effect is shocking, as only conventional morality, which assiduously turns its gaze from truth towards some shape of its own bad manufacture, can shock. Under its influence the characters lose all their personality and become horrible spectres of hypocrisy, grinning and repentant. And so a book with many good points has been spoiled, as many another book has been spoiled before it.

Suzanne. By VALENTINA HAWTREY. (Murray, 6s.)

To write a thoroughly interesting story of provincial life in France in the fourteenth century is no light task, and Miss Hawtreys is to be congratulated upon her success in "Suzanne." From the first page, the characters, their environment, the motives that actuate them, arrest attention. A third of the volume passes and finds us too deeply absorbed in the affair of the Châtelfors household to regret the tardy appearance of the real heroine, Suzanne, whose coming practically divides the story into two parts, the domestic and the adventurous. Matthieu, Sieur de Châtelfors, rules his family and his serfs with cheerful despotism, a twinkle in the eye, and a grim set of the mouth, disregarding the wishes of his formidable grandmother and his sharp-tongued betrothed, who has spent her girlhood fretting against his indifference. With a sad want of chivalry he refuses to marry Huette until such time as it pleases him to fulfil his bargain. Leaving her enraged and humiliated by her false position, Matthieu departs for the wars, and on the march rescues and marries Suzanne, a comely peasant girl. Thereafter follow adventures in camp and field, and at the sieges of Bergues and Gravelines. To do Matthieu justice, he is faithful to Suzanne, who is in all essentials worthy of her position. The tragic ending of the story is inevitable, its pathos heightened by Huette's vindictiveness towards her innocent supplanter. Among the many characters that play their parts in these crowded and varied scenes is Jehan, the shepherd, the sort of malicious fool it is difficult to suffer gladly more than once or twice. To those who have admired the author's previous work it is sufficient to say that "Suzanne" reaches her usual high standard in interest and execution. The story runs as smoothly and naturally as if the people and events were of to-day, and the style is irreproachable.

The Undertaker's Field. By HERBERT COMPTON. (Bachelor & Benedict, 6s.)

MR. COMPTON has deserted Kensington Palace and the unfortunate Brunswick princess and has drawn his inspiration from the smell of rum and the sound of creaking timbers. We do not need the terrifying assurance that "The Ship" and the "Undertaker's Field" really exist; "within twenty-five miles of Charing Cross"; the author set out to "make our flesh creep" and he succeeds. Rum is not the only spirit in these pages: there is another, an awesome shadow, decorated with an uncomfortable Malay "kris" in the region of the heart. This terrible apparition, pirate and fratricide in the flesh, must have expended his last atom of homicidal energy on his own suicide, for surely a more easily appeased spectre never walked; a jug of hot water and a tumbler of grog have but to be placed in his path and he haunts no more that night. But we are not dependent on this half-hearted villain for the curdling of our blood. There is a blasted oak, from which a rusty chain hangs creaking; a closed chamber; a murder on the high seas, and, wafted through it all, the mysterious, inexplicable odour of rum. The accidental stumbling upon a pair of ancestors, pickled (in rum!), and a buried treasure is a mere incident in this tragic tale. The fact that it deals with the direct descendants of a buccaneer and the daughter of the Great Mogul may account for this lurid family history. In the intervals of his arduous task of heaping horror upon horror, Mr. Compton finds time for a very pleasant love-story. The hero is really lovable, and the heroine, in spite of her unfortunate ancestry, charming. The cad is such a cad that it is an effort to go through the first chapter in his company, and his last letter from his betrothed fills us with unmixed satisfaction. "Brute, Go!" is all it contains. In the use of nicknames the author has given full scope to his fancy. The "Rapid Rhone" and the "Venerable Venables," are merely playful examples of alliteration: the minds revolts against an Editor called "Lotus-lily"! But "in romance all things are permissible," we are told. We lay down the book with the old Scotch prayer upon our lips: "From ghouls and ghosts and lang-legged beasties and things that go bump in the night, gude Lord deliver us."

Traitor and True. By JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON. (Long, 6s.)

IT is not often that a title suggests the nature of a book so admirably as in the present case. "Traitor and True" is a proper foreshadowing in every sense of Mr. Bloundelle-Burton's romance. "Traitor or True," with a mark of interrogation, would have been commonplace. The bold, incisive linking of contradictions beyond question was necessary. So we expected to have our feelings torn and harrowed, our interest stirred to the pitch of excitement; we expected to meet a hero worthy of admiration, a villain worth hating, a wronged woman who in spite of her mistakes awakens unmitigated pity. All our expectations were realised. The book opens with the dark plots of rascal soldados, and gradually light is thrown upon their evil design, which is no less than to put Louis the King from his throne and foist into his place a usurper. But Humphrey West, a young Englishman, overhears these truculent villains, and by his daring foils their wickedness, and by his virtue withstands even the charms of the adventuress who cannot help being traitor to her king and true to her passionate love for the usurper. Mr. Bloundelle-Burton has gained a large circle of readers and admirers by his romances: they will certainly hail his latest with approving delight. He has never written anything more amazing and adventurous and breathless.

FINE ART

THE GUILDHALL EXHIBITION

THE early Flemish schools of painting are pre-eminently the happy hunting-ground of the experts, a hunting-ground in which the game is mutual slaughter rather than ascriptions. Mr. Weale, Mr. Marks, and M. Bouchot are usually engaged in a triangular duel, and M. Camille Benoit, Sir

Walter Armstrong, Sir Martin Conway, and others occasionally "chip in."

Just read this account of St. Victor with a donor :

This work was originally attributed to Mabuse, but latterly, by Sir Walter Armstrong, to Hugo van der Goes. Herr Schone, Dr. Bode, and M. J. Wauters think it to be by John van Eyck, while M. von Seidlitz recognises a closer relationship to Memling than to any other master. M. Camille Benoit considers it to be the work of a French painter of the close of the fifteenth century, the Maitre des Portraits of 1488; and M. René de Vauloger . . .

Really, one's brain reels under this sort of infliction. No doubt these learned gentlemen can and do defend their ascriptions with great cogency and force, but to the layman the effect is that of justifying him in not looking at the pictures.

I mean, not looking at them simply with a view to enjoying them, but of getting the "straight tip." I was distressed to see stockbrokers, instead of treating a visit to the Guildhall as a holiday, continuing their usual pursuits and discussing the pictures with the help of the catalogue as if they were shares in the market. Since there is no sort of sporting interest in the modern masters, the consequence is that they are apt to be neglected.

The acknowledged masters, the Van Eycks, Van Orley, Mabuse, Lucas de Heere, are admirably represented, as well as the later Flemings, Rubens, Van Dyck, etc.; but I must say that I am more interested in the efforts of contemporary artists. Their problems are our problems, and, if their solutions are not as perfect as those of the Old Masters, our sympathies ought to be the more readily extended to them. The modern Belgians, however, have maintained the traditions of their superb past more faithfully than any other painters. The historical school, which is strongly represented in Louis Gallait, Baron Leys, Emile Wauters, Willem Geets, is composed of the direct descendants of the Early Flemings, and their work is technically more accomplished than that of our Abbays and Alma Tademas. It is a cold and dead art, perhaps, but its perfection is remarkable.

It is a pity that the egregious van Beers is only represented by his later work, the vulgar and tedious portrait of Sarah Bernhardt. Those who have never seen his Trial of a Witch, a picture with about 300 portraits, all unflinchingly depicted by a modern Quentin Matsys, or the Death-bed of an Ecclesiastic, with its marvellous study of an aged nude torso, have not realised what a great artist was lost when he began to debase his talent. Théophile Lybaert and Henri de Braekeleer are more directly imitators of the old Flemings and Dutchmen. The exquisite workmanship of the latter's Hall of the Brewers House, Antwerp, is reminiscent of Van der Meer; The Curtain leans more to Van Eyck, and A Girl Reading to De Hoogh. After the Wedding by Willem Linnig, a study of the disorder of a wedding breakfast is, on the other hand, entirely of its period and is a magnificent performance. This painter, like Emile Sacré, whose Young Woman with a Fan is almost worthy of Manet, died early.

Alfred Stevens is one of the many painters of our time in whom a certain strain of vulgarity, not unpleasant at first and even containing a certain charm, the charm of naïve power, becomes disagreeable when that power declines. The Young Girl reading is a delightful "crinoline" creation, date 1856. India in Paris, of perhaps a rather later period, is masterly in its handling of the bric-à-brac as well as in the painting of the beautiful woman's head. On the other hand, Fedora, dated 1882, is quite dreadful, vulgar yet incompetent.

B. S.

ROUND THE GALLERIES

THOUGH a newcomer to London, M. Naoum Aronson, the Russian sculptor, whose group of statuary dominates the Summer Exhibition at the Goupil Gallery (5 Regent Street), already enjoys a considerable reputation on the Continent, and this reputation would be justified if his only exhibit here were the Beethoven, which must certainly be reckoned among the most remarkable busts of modern times. Many busts of Beethoven have been exhibited recently, but almost all have been reproductions of the death-mask; and, since in taking this mask the upper lip of the composer was accidentally twisted, modern sculptors have been in the habit of giving Beethoven a deformity from which he did not suffer. M. Aronson's avoidance of this error is not the greatest merit of a work which is creative as well as representative. The modelling is profoundly expressive, and the brooding pose of the head is so subtly eloquent of genius that the bust is worthy to take its allotted place in the Beethoven Museum at Bonn. A bust of Tolstoy and a head of an old woman further testify to M. Aronson's gift for seizing character, while the graceful lines of the Statuette, designed for a fountain ornament, show a constructive ability which few modern sculptors possess. To appreciate M. Aronson's mastery of art and the diversity of his technique, it is sufficient to compare the rugged, Rodinesque strength of his Beethoven with the suave charm of such delicate, highly finished marble busts as the Marseillaise and Petit Romain.

In its painting section the Goupil has to offer us not so much novelties as good examples of old favourites. Mr. Grosvenor Thomas (22), Mr. A. D. Peppercorn (25), and Mr. Bertram Priestman (23, 24) are seen at their best, and at their best they are very good indeed. Whistler (The Girl in Red), Anton Mauve, Corot, Dupré, and other painters of greater present fame are satisfactorily represented, but the examples of their well-known art scarcely call for detailed comment. For novelties we must turn to the drawings shown in this comprehensive exhibition, drawings, with two exceptions, by young artists who have yet to win their spurs. To Miss Enid Jackson's virile portrait-studies reference has already been made in these columns, while the architectural studies in pen and ink of Mr. Hanslip Fletcher confirm the promise of his exhibit in the Academy Black-and-White room; but the romantic landscapes and vigorous portrait-study, all in charcoal, by Mr. Paul Henry, are altogether a surprise. Mr. Henry, if we remember rightly, has exhibited in Paris and done some illustrative work for Mr. John Lane, but these decorative drawings, charged with a Celtic emotiveness, reveal a serious talent which has hitherto escaped detection.

At the Baillie Gallery (54 Baker Street), where many talented young artists have made their début, two further surprises await the student of contemporary painting. On entering the gallery he will imagine there is some error in the catalogue, and that certain works by Messrs. Ricketts and C. H. Shannon have found their way to the walls unrecorded. Investigation shows, however, that paintings which possess many of the distinctive qualities usually identified with these two artists, must be attributed to Mr. Glyn W. Philpot, a painter who has barely turned twenty-one. If at this age the quality of his paint, the dignity and inventiveness of his designs, and his melodious, reticent colour can rival that of his self-appointed models, to what heights should he not attain by the time he has reached their present age? His tendency—most fashionable nowadays—unduly to degrade the flesh tints, he will outgrow; and if he be not in too great a hurry to dispense with the model, his drawing, already simple and expressive, may acquire that strength and inevitableness that show the master. Meanwhile, the high seriousness of this young painter is the best augury for the development of his indisputable genius.

Mr. Louis A. Sargent, another of Mr. Baillie's discoveries, is an artist of a very different type. His natural medium is not oil-paint, but water-colour; his natural bent not realistic or decorative, but imaginative and illustrative. At present pastel would suit him even better than water-colour, for even with the last he approaches nearer to the bloom of pastel than to that limpid freshness of colour which is the hall-mark of the aquarelle. Mr. Sargent is seen at his best in his blue-grey, imaginative landscapes which have a mysterious charm and grave style that are quite his own, but the strange designs to which he has been inspired by Coleridge, Nietzsche, and Blake suggest that he would prove an effective and original illustrator to literature which does not easily lend itself to pictorial treatment.

Of the remaining exhibitors at Mr. Baillie's the most important is Mr. Montague Smyth, who has been to China and Japan and painted them pleasantly, if not strikingly, in the Modern Dutch manner. It is difficult to believe that these Far-Eastern scenes are always so cool and grey as they are depicted by Mr. Smyth, or that these dull moments are their most characteristic. But, if they would be improved by a readier acknowledgment of the sun's power, these landscapes are uniformly decorative, the point of view being well chosen, whilst the water-colours are delightful and strongly personal examples of the pure and proper use of that medium.

Mr. J. Kerr-Lawson's decorative panels, which Messrs. Carfax are exhibiting at the Alpine Club, consist of paintings some six feet high of familiar scenes in Rome, Florence and Venice, and they are so disposed in the gallery as approximately to reproduce their general effect when placed in the drawing-room at Stoke Rochford, Grantham, for which they are intended. The quiet blue-grey tints, which predominate, admirably harmonise with the white scheme of the room, and the whole should form what Major Pendennis would have called a "vewychaste" apartment. Although well-painted views of the Forum, the Colleone Monument, The Baptistery, Florence, etc., are decorative and reposeful ornaments for a drawing-room, they do not give a painter much scope for the humour that in him is. Mr. Kerr-Lawson, however, has overcome the difficulty to some extent in San Firenze, whose shops are allotted to Mr. Bernhard Berenson—as a purveyor of "Tactile Values"—Mr. Maurice Hewlett, and other celebrated persons.

MUSIC

THE VIENNA PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

IN face of the reproach that London, with its millions from which to draw its material, cannot boast a single first-rate chorus, we are generally very ready to retort with the excellence of our orchestral music. We have good cause to be proud of possessing two such organisations as the London Symphony and the Queen's Hall orchestras, not only because of the high artistic level of their performances, but also because there are very few among the younger generation of music-lovers in London (we might almost say in England) who do not owe a very large part of their musical education to the efforts of these two societies. Most of us have sat, or more often stood at their feet in the promenade concert season, both when the present London Symphony orchestra was called by the name of the other and was conducted by Mr. Wood, and since the formation of the present Queen's Hall orchestra. There, as well as at the symphony concerts of both societies, many of us have heard important new works for the first time or grown familiar with old ones; but, besides this, they have brought us into such close touch with the orchestra as practically to place it within the means of every one to acquire the necessary technique of listening to orchestral music. I remember well how, as a boy—the first time I had an opportunity of listening regularly to a full orchestra—the sound would prevent me hearing the music, and consequently how difficult it was to follow works which, if played on the piano, my musical intelligence would have readily grasped. At the time I write of I had had considerable musical education, but none in the subject of orchestral colour, so that I knew enough to be conscious of my disability. Many people are not conscious of it, or rather of its cause, but, when they are baffled by the myriad shades of colour produced, they go away imagining that they must be unmusical, whereas practice would give them this technique of hearing as it will any other where the temperament is fitted to the task. This important branch of musical education—to the average amateur it is perhaps the most important—our permanent orchestras have made the most accessible, with the result that the power of enjoying orchestral music is at present the most widespread form of musical ability amongst Londoners. I venture to preface my remarks thus to avoid misunderstanding, because I am going to suggest that we have lately had a revelation in orchestral playing in the visit of the Vienna Philharmonic Society. Considering all that has been done for us in orchestral education, people might have shown more enterprise by attending the first concert on June 26 in larger numbers; but this was only an instance of the complaisant British attitude towards a new experience. Whatever may be thought of this orchestra as compared with English orchestras, there can be no doubt that to hear it was an entirely new experience, and one which, like most genuine musical experiences, cannot be put upon paper. It was not merely that they played with wonderful precision, that the wind was wonderfully refined (there were no quacking oboes or blazing brass): our English orchestras can achieve all this; but either in Herr Schalk or his men, or in both, for they seem as one, there rests a consummate sense of proportion. This gives to each movement as they play it a perfect draughtsmanship. The figure is conceived in its entirety, but every feature is perfectly articulated. There is, on the one hand, no mere sketch of detail to give a complete effect, on the other no clumsy exaggeration of any one feature. If this is true: "It is the work of the conductor," will be the reply; and it may be, probably it is so. But, here again, orchestra and conductor form such a complete organism that to differentiate between them would seem as absurd as to single out for remark the work of the solo violoncellist or clarinettist.

It was in works not remarkable for perfect balance of shape—I avoid the word "form" because it has been so misused as the catch-word of the pedant—that this wonderful quality seemed to take command, so to speak, in the playing of the Vienna Philharmonic Society. In the C minor Symphony of Beethoven we lost sight of it in the magnificent proportions of the work itself, but in Weber's Oberon Overture and Elgar's Variations it was most powerfully illustrated. Now, in both of these delightful works the "form" (used in the technical sense) is quite irreproachable. Weber's is the conventional form of the concert overture, Elgar's the time-honoured form of a theme with variations; but with the first, composed as it is of fragments of the opera woven with ingenuity into a single piece, it is more remarkable for its charming scraps of melody and its picturesque colouring than for any particular nobility of structure. The same is true of Elgar's works as a whole, and, though the precise form of the work performed saves it from the defects common to many of his other works, it is like a set of delightful water-colour sketches rather than a greatly conceived picture. To continue the picture simile, scenes from the Oberon opera are placed together on one canvas in the overture, the scenes from the lives of Elgar and his friends are framed separately and hung in a row in his "Enigma" Variations, but in neither case is the inner unity of design at first sight apparent. This the orchestra brought out in a way I have never heard elsewhere, and it was done by this perfectly poised sense of the relative importance of each detail to the whole. So what the conventional programme book describes as "a brilliant coda concluding the overture," sounded like a splendid summary of its emotion, the achievement of its end, its τέλος. In the variations, although marred by the ill-judged applause of the British public, who seemed surprised that the foreigners so well understood its hero, yet it was the relation of one variation to its surrounding ones and the articulation of all the musical material, which with Elgar is too apt to become merged in a vague sense of colour, that gave the performance its distinction. Every one has been ready to remark on the extraordinary vigour of the playing, of the strings especially, but, after all, vigour is no new quality to the habitués of Queen's Hall. I doubt whether the Queen's Hall orchestra could well be surpassed in vigour and energy, or the London Symphony Orchestra in beauty and refinement of tone. But in the Vienna Philharmonic there is a principle beyond these qualities which at a first hearing may be mistaken for a more complete possession of them. Indeed, it practically amounts to this, since it is the ordering and adjustment of all these resources to their true function of interpretation, in fact the perfect technique, subjecting itself to artistic ends, which raises their playing to its commanding level. This perfect sense of proportion and the power to achieve it the crowning graces of a complete art, and can never be present in a young and growing artistic movement. It is the same with schools of composition as with schools of performance. It is as lacking in the pioneer works of Monteverde, Philip Emanuel Bach and Wagner as it is present in those of Handel and Beethoven and of Brahms. The musical life of England, and especially the cultivation of orchestral technique both as regards conductors and players, is in a state of ardent, almost feverish development. It has so grown up even within the short memories of the youngest of us that this quality, the result of generations of thoughtful application to its problems, is not to be expected, but it is all the more worth appreciating where it is to be found. England's adulation of all that was foreign in music was once a symptom of her disease, which brought her art almost to death's door; her present rather wilful repudiation of it is a sign of convalescence growing into health. We want to do things for ourselves and not to be nursed any longer, and it is well that we should do so, in spite of the fact that the nurse can still perhaps do better. And it so happened that we were not very anxious to find anything in the Viennese playing beyond what we already know. However, luckily their playing was so good as to compel us to reflect, and reflecting to learn, so that their visit cannot have been in vain.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. HEINEMANN announces for publication in the early autumn "Madame Récamier and her Friends," by M. Herriot. At the last meeting of the French Academy it was decided to award one thousand francs of the Bordin Prize to M. Herriot, in recognition of the value of this book.

Messrs. Bemrose will publish shortly two new volumes in their "Memorials of the Counties of England Series," "Wiltshire," edited by Alice Dryden, and "Somerset," edited by F. J. Snell, M.A.

Mr. Horace Cox announces that early in July he will issue a book entitled "Central African Game and its Spoor," by Capt. C. H. Stigand, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S., and D. D. Lyell—a complete hunter's guide on big game, shooting, tracking, etc., in Central Africa. It is to be copiously illustrated with photographs of game and many drawings of their spoor.

A further interesting announcement is made in connection with the "Stratford Town" Shakespeare, of which vol. vii. will shortly be issued. The Shakespeare Head Press will give as frontispiece to vol. viii. the first direct reproduction of the famous Garrick Club bust of Shakespeare. Hitherto all representations of this bust have been made from one of the two plaster casts, as it was said to be impossible to obtain a successful photograph of the original black terra-cotta bust. This difficulty has, however, been overcome, and the result is an admirable addition to the extant portraits of Shakespeare. The publishers have secured the services of Mr. M. H. Spielmann to contribute an elaborate essay on Shakespeare portraits to the last volume of this edition.

The serial publication of a new novel—"Running Water"—by Mr. A. E. W. Mason will begin in the August number of The Century Magazine.

Mr. Eugene Merrill is publishing with Mr. Werner Laurie "Art in the Dumps," a satire on the commercialism of British literature, drama, painting and music, presented under the guise of a Tariff Commission Report.

"The Finality of the Christian Religion," by Professor G. B. Foster, will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin on July 9. The book, which is partly philosophical and partly historical in character, is written from an advanced theological and critical standpoint. Its object is to set forth Christianity, not as a religion dependent on miraculous facts or authoritative dogmas, but as an inward religion of spirit and personality. Another theological book which Mr. Unwin will publish on the same day is a work on "The Messianic Hope in the New Testament," by Mr. Shailer Mathews.

"The Ha'penny Millionaire," by George Sunbury, which Messrs. Methuen have in the press, concerns a bank porter, who, after forty years spent in opening and shutting the bank door, received a handsome pension, and sets out at the age of fifty-six with the intention of "seeing life." His innocent explorations take him into the frivolous society of sea-side entertainers, pierrots, and nigger-minstrels. He essays love, finance, and athletics, and finally, having tried every form of gaiety that he can imagine, arrives at a comfortable conclusion.

The Rev. Bridgeman Boughton-Leigh's "Memorials of a Warwickshire Family" will be published this month by Mr. Henry Frowde.

Messrs. Otto Schulze and Co., of Edinburgh, announce a new translation of "Aucassin and Nicolette," by M. S. Henry, versified by Edward W. Thomson. The edition (limited to five hundred) will be a quarto printed on hand-made paper and ornamented by Celtic initials, head and tail-pieces.—The same firm have in preparation Part iii. of their Early English Prose Romances, edited by William J. Thoms and ornamented by Harold Nelson: "The Famous History of Fryer Bacon." The two first parts, "The Lyfe of Robert the Deuyll" and "The Noble Birth and Gallant Atchievements of that remarkable Outlaw Robin Hood," are already published, and the fourth part, "A Pleasant Historie of Frier Rush," will complete the volume.

We are presently to have a new edition of Mr. Swinburne's critical study of William Blake, with a new preface, in which Mr. Swinburne makes statements regarding the origin of Celticism, Matthew Arnold's connection therewith, and Blake in relation thereto. Further evidence of revived interest in Blake is the fact that Mr. Arthur Symonds has nearly finished a study of the man, the poet, and the painter, with contemporary estimates.

A volume of reminiscences by Mr. Frederic Harrison, will be published shortly. It is forty-four years since Mr. Harrison published his first book, "The Meaning of History." Mr. Harrison's memoirs will contain several articles contributed to English and American reviews, and will be entitled "Memories and Thoughts—Stories of Books—Men—Places—Art."

The "Life and Letters of Sir Leslie Stephen," with which Professor Maitland has for some time past been occupied, will be one of the most interesting of the coming autumn publications. As first editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography," Leslie Stephen had a herculean task in marshalling the army of contributors for that great work, and in the correspondence involved there are revealed traits of character and sidelights on literary and historical personages that give a peculiar value to the work.

ART FOR ART'S SAKE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In this jerry-building age, when quantity is preferred to quality and notoriety is made the criterion of eminence, it would be surprising if the nature of art were understood of the multitude. Nevertheless, it is with pained astonishment that I find a contributor to your columns condemning the "petty cry of Art for Art's sake" as the "latest expression of the baseborn craving after professional gentility." If it be snobbish, as C. B. contends, to declare "the subject unworthy of treatment," what is his quarrel with the artist for art's sake who maintains that every subject is worthy of treatment, who echoes the advice of Old Crome: "John my boy, if your subject is only a pigsty—dignify it"?

In an unguarded moment Tennyson observed to Mr. Gosse, "it matters very little what we say, it is how we say it—though the fools don't know it." Now this is a half-truth, and it is one of those mischievous half-truths which do infinite harm to the cause the poet had at heart. It matters a great deal morally what we say. It matters a great deal artistically how we say it. Every human activity, complete or incomplete, may be regarded from two standpoints; we may consider what the action is, or how it is done. If we consider what the action is, our attitude is that of the statesman or moralist; if we consider how it is done, our attitude is that of the artist. From a purely artistic standpoint, then, it does matter very little what we write, what we paint, and a great deal how we write, how we paint; for reduced to its essentials the doctrine of art for art's sake is no more—and no less—than a modernised version of the old saw, "If a thing is worth doing it is worth doing well." This is the common sense of "art for art's sake," and I cannot conceive why so modest and honest an ambition should be termed snobbery by C. B., and by Mr. Quiller-Couch "chatter which died a dishonoured death but a short while ago, and which it is still one of the joys of life to have outlived." (Does the survival explain the "and which"?)

But it may be urged that a work of art must be judged by a wider outlook than that of the craftsman, that in every picture, in every poem there is in addition to the art a conscious or unconscious philosophy of life which the artist, strive as he may, cannot conceal. Granted that this be so, painters and poets are men as well as artists, and if good artists be also good men they will see to it that their paintings and writings do not offend statesmen and moralists. Happily or unhappily, men of low moral character have been gifted with high artistic talent, and shallow minds, seizing upon eccentricity as a substitute for the originality they lack, have argued on the post hoc propter hoc principle that the immoral is the artistic. Silly chatter is this in truth, for although the fact of a man being a poisoner may not affect the merits of his prose, we should admire the prose not because but in spite of the criminality of the writer. From the time of Aristotle it has been clear to all who have made a serious study of aesthetics that art and morals are not in the same category, and but for the confusion of thought which has been created by recent writers on art it would be unnecessary to discuss a question which has been answered so eloquently, lucidly and indisputably by Mr. Swinburne in his essay on Hugo's L'Année Terrible.

"We admit then that the worth of a poem has properly nothing to do with its moral meaning or design, that the praise of a Cæsar as sung by Virgil, of a Stuart as sung by Dryden, is preferable to the most magnanimous invective against tyranny which love of country and of liberty could wring from a Bavarian or a Settler; but on the other hand we refuse to admit that art of the highest kind may not ally itself with moral or religious passion, with the ethics or the politics of a nation or an age. It does not detract from the poetic supremacy of Æschylus and of Dante, of Milton and of Shelley, that they should have been pleased to put their art to such use; nor does it detract from the sovereign greatness of other poets that they should have had no note of song for any such theme."

It is the "how" and not the "what" that ultimately decides the value of any work of art. No artist had a greater regard for morality than the late G. F. Watts. No painter sought more consistently to choose subjects with a noble purpose. Theoretically he would have repudiated the doctrine of art for art's sake, which he did not understand, yet the honesty of the man wrung from his heart a confirmatory confession of its truth when he wrote in the Nineteenth Century: "Heroic art must be noble in its treatment of the means at its disposition, line, colour, and texture, and must have a correspondingly noble subject, though subject has perhaps less to do with it than character of utterance."

HERESIES ON STYLE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The article with the above title, which appeared in your issue of June 30, must have appealed to many of your readers. For all who are interested in the ACADEMY are attracted more or less by the questions discussed in that article. The writer is certainly right when he emphasises the fact that if a book is to live it must contain ideas which will suggest thoughts to the reader. Such books are sure to be possessions for ever. The world will never willingly let them die if the writer has taken pains to make himself understood and to clothe his ideas in suitable language. This doubtless is the chief function of style—to help in the dissemination of great ideas. But the world is growing old and new ideas of value to the human race are not often met with. Therefore literature has to deal with commonplace thoughts that belong to writer and reader alike. In such a case it is not so much what the author says as how he says it that matters. Your contributor suggests that Pater may have hoped that his books would live on account of his style. Well, Pater has some claim to be regarded as a Platonist and his reverence for his master may have led him to take a humble view of his own ideas. He determined at any rate to clothe them in as fitting a garb as he could.

SHELLEY'S RELIGION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In spite of the quotation from "Adonais" cited by Mr. Edward Wright, I, for one, have difficulty in thinking Shelley "a man with a divided mind." Rather am I inclined to think this solitary instance was a lapse from what Shelley deemed a higher faith than belief in a deity; a lapse, possibly due to mental suffering in the face of death, accompanied by the human craving for consolation.

The incomparable "Hymn to Intellectual Beauty" seems to me to state clearly Shelley's creed.

"I vowed that I would dedicate my powers
To thee and thine—have I not kept the vow?
With beating heart and streaming eyes, even now
I call the phantom of a thousand hours
Each from his voiceless grave: they have in visioned bowers
Of studious zeal or love's delight
Outwatched with me the envious night—
They know that never joy illumed my brow
Unlinked with hope that thou wouldst free
This world from its dark slavery,
That thou—O awful LOVELINESS,
Wouldst give whate'er these words cannot express."

And did not Richard Jefferies in "The Story of My Heart" display the same faith? What, too, says William Watson?

"Beauty: the Vision whereunto,
In joy, with pantings, from afar,
Through sound and odour, form and hue,
And mind and clay, and worm and star—
Now touching goal, now backward hurled—Toils the indomitable world."

"AMERICA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I suppose the usage or non-usage of "America" (to describe the U.S.A.) is really a question of verbal convenience.

Whatever may have been the case three hundred years ago, to-day in common parlance America is not a hemisphere (as you suggest) but a single country.

If the Canadians and Mexicans do not object why should we? Why not let the Americans possess America, even as the Dutch have captured Holland.

POET, NOVELIST AND CRITIC

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The minor poet—why "minor"? We do not say a "minor" critic, a "minor" novelist, a "minor" editor. Poetry as distinguished from verification, is different in kind, and should be valued according to its merits in its own class. Gray never gathered into a world-sweeping epic the tempestuous experiences of some untamable or unconquerable soul. Is Gray a "minor" poet? Shall we dub Keats a "minor" poet because no great drama stands to his credit? or disparage the charms of Herrick because his lines lack the austere majesty of Milton's? Each of these poets is a master in his own province. There has been a Sainte-Beuve in the world, shall we therefore stigmatise the criticisms of a Hazlitt? A wayside flower may be no rose, but in its humility and loveliness it may say more to us than some gorgeous sister in the garden. We do not call it a "minor" flower.

Somewhat timorously I would touch on a topic suggested by a paragraph in your editorial columns. You say, "Because he knows that is exactly why a man is selected by an Editor to be a reviewer." You remember the lines,

"But seldom comes the poet here,

And the critic's rarer still?"

Now have the reviewers selected by editors that indubitable knowledge claimed for them? We may, we probably do, feel a sincere respect for reviewers, and yet we may also have serious doubts as to the infallibility of their judgments. If half a dozen responsible critics were to discuss a production in verse by some eminent contemporary would they be unanimous on all points? Would there not rather be six different opinions at each stage of discussion? If their verdict were unanimous would it also be final?

Grant the critic knowledge: yet he must have more than this. Great criticism transcends mere knowing, it is inspiration. In all the arts the highway to fame is strewn with the scattered fragments of altars raised to forgotten deities by men who knew; and not a few who in times past were bespattered with the mud of a contemptuous criticism, or insulted by the condescending patronage of the arbitrary wise, sit now on their thrones and smile. The gods who reign in the world of art may be indeed grateful for the infinite diversity of human opinion and for the fallibility of wise men. Knowledge never yet made a poet, nor will mere knowledge ever make a great critic, for truth in this, as in not a few other things, is with those who, having other eminently essential qualities, feel most deeply.

Now have our reviewers—I do not speak of the privileged critic, elevated and remote, whose vision is unobscured by the floating mists of controversy, whose judgments are mellowed by long contemplation, but of those less fortunate reviewers who toil for their guineas in the vortex of things—have these reviewers, I ask, any time to feel? Very often perforce they can but glance and press on. The niceties of true criticism cannot be reconciled with the pressure of present-day conditions; that placid lucidity of mind, that fine sense of the fit and the perfect, and that ready, luminous sympathy which leaps as it were to an author's heart and grasps the pith and tendency of his thought—these qualities, rare in themselves, rare indeed in conjunction, can we expect to find then sweetly balanced and conjoined in those whose heads throb with the pitiless hum of the hurrying hours, and whose brains are dazed with the weariless whirl of words? It would seem, however conscientious a busy reviewer may be, that he is of necessity compelled, such are the conditions, to ignore much in order to give a quantum of consideration to a little, thus he can be neither altogether just to himself nor to those authors whose work comes to him for review, for true criticism, like true poetry, has birth in the tranquil communion of mind and heart.

With regard to poets and reviewers: I believe I voice a thought which lies in the minds of many when I say that the interests of literature would be better served if something of that tolerance were extended to poetry which is so readily accorded to fiction. The mediocrity, which in a novelist is too frequently connived at, brings on a poet the most severe condemnation. I do not quarrel with the castigation of mediocrity, I sue for no favours, but that fairness in a fair field which is ever readily conceded to all by true Englishmen, which is the privilege of the criminal in the dock and of the wrestler in the ring—this the poet has a right to expect. At his worst the young writer of verse, with very rare exceptions, panders to no vices, nor does he palliate the delinquencies of society; his ideas may not infrequently be worn threadbare, but they are clean and healthy; can more be said for the average popular novelist?

I would not appear to disparage or underestimate the value of fiction. The novelist wields a power whose far-reaching influence, for good and evil, is altogether unguessed at; his is a power which, to no insignificant extent, is silently shaping our national destiny;—for this reason then, if for no other, would not benefit accrue if a modicum of that consideration, so unstintingly bestowed on novels more or less noxious, were given to poetry?—for it is our poetry which has made our literature glorious in the past, and this cold, even insolent, neglect of contemporary verse is unwarranted.

PLACE-NAMES AS EVIDENCE OF FEMALE OWNERSHIP IN ANGLO-SAXON TIMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Among the many difficulties which attend the theory that the primitive land-holding unit in Anglo-Saxon law was the exclusive family group or "clan," reckoning descent through males only, the fact that at an early period females were capable of transmitting rights of inheritance in land to their descendants holds a prominent place. The fact itself is certain, but in view of the scarcity of early legal documents bearing upon this point it may be well to note that a certain amount of relevant evidence can be derived from a study of local nomenclature. There exists a distinct class of English place-names in which one of the familiar suffixes tun, ham, leah, etc., is compounded with a female personal name in a way which can only denote ownership of the place in question on the part of the person whose name is represented in the prefix. The cumulative significance of names of this type could only be determined by a minute study of place-names all over England, but we may give as examples from the midland counties Adderbury, Oxfordshire; Kenilworth, Warwickshire; Chelington, Bedfordshire; Kemerton, Worcestershire, and Eddington, Berkshire; which are compounded respectively with the female names Eadburh, Cynechild, Ceolwynn, Cyneburh and Eadgifu. The exact dialectical form in which these latter names appear in early records does not concern us here, but they are enough to prove the female ownership of sites which ultimately became recognised as centres of habitation in the current local nomenclature, and a collection of such names would form an argument of some force against the universal extension of the agnatic village community.

"LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME"

SIR,—In Mr. Sherard's recent Life of Oscar Wilde pages 316–319, allusion is made to a particular copy of "Lord Arthur Savile's Crime" which is inscribed "Constance from Oscar July '91." Mr. Sherard says that certain passages, which he quotes, have been underlined by the author "to call attention to them"; and on this theory he writes a good deal of malapropos moralising. May I say the little book was once mine, and that I underlined the passages because I admired them, and that another twinge is added to my regret at having parted with it?

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-sledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

THE LITERARY WEEK

IN a learned and interesting paper read before the International Congress of Arts and Sciences at St. Louis in September 1904 and recently contributed, with additions and alterations, to a contemporary, Professor E. A. Sonnenschein deals with "Latin as an Intellectual Force," tracing its unbroken influence on modern thought, modern religion, modern law, modern poetry, and modern art, and declaring that the study of the Greek and Latin Classics "is in reality a study of our own past—our very own—divorced from which all that is most characteristic in the present is only half intelligible." "It is," he continues, "because . . . modern life is soaked with Greek and still more with Latin influences, that it will always depend for its complete interpretation on a study of the classics—that is, so long as the landmarks of our present culture remain unshifted."

Wise words; and they seem all the wiser after a perusal of Dr. Sonnenschein's article, which shows, among other things, the remarkable part played by Stoicism in its highest form in the development of our own thought and morality. But there is a point of special interest in the paper, which is our real reason for referring to it. Dr. Sonnenschein illustrates the influence of Latin upon English literature by a fact which he discovered some two years ago. Portia's speech on mercy is based, in his opinion, upon Seneca's tract "De Clementia." The parallel passages were communicated by Dr. Sonnenschein to a contemporary some two years ago, but their importance is so great that the possibility of their having escaped the notice of many students of Shakespeare induces us to give them here in full:

It becomes

The throned monarch better than his crown. (M. of V. iv. 1.)
Nullum clementia ex omnibus magis quam regem aut principem decet. (Seneca, De Clementia, i. 3, 3.)

'Tis mightiest in the mightiest.

Eo scilicet formosius id esse magnificentiusque fatebimur quo in maiore praestabitur potestate (i. 19, 1):

But mercy is above this sceptred sway,

It is enthroned in the hearts of kings:

It is an attribute of God himself.

Quod si di placabiles et aequi delicta potentium non statim fulminibus persequuntur, quanto aequius est hominem hominibus praepositum miti animo exercere imperium? (i. 7, 2):

And earthly power doth then show likest God's

When mercy seasons justice.

Quid autem? Non proximum eis (dis) locum tenet is qui se ex deorum natura gerit beneficus et largus et in melius potens? (i. 19, 9):

Consider this,

That, in the course of justice, none of us

Should see salvation.

Cogitato . . . quanta solitudo et vastitas futura sit si nihil relinquitur nisi quod iudex severus absolverit (i. 6, 1).

Professor Sonnenschein's advice to students of Shakespeare: "Study the prose works of Seneca," seems very pertinent after the perusal of these remarkable parallels.

Between 1894 and 1898 there was in existence a Review of current scientific investigation called Science Progress, conducted by Sir Henry Burdett, K.C.B., and edited by Professor J. Bretland Farmer. Since 1898, when the original Science Progress ceased publication, there has been "no British science journal, devoted to those comprehensive summaries of recent work, to those general discussions of topics of interest to workers in all branches of science, which were the predominant features of the old publication and for which it was rightly valued." We draw those words from the "Editorial" to the new Science Progress in the Twentieth Century, a quarterly journal of scientific thought, of which the first number (Murray, 5s. net) lies before us. The Editors of the new journal are Dr. N. H. Alcock and Mr. W. G. Freeman, and there is an advisory committee of thirteen, containing many names well known in the world of science.

The "Editorial" referred to gives a very clear idea of the views of the Editors. The first is to present summaries ("as far as possible of a non-technical character") of important recent work in any branch of science, to show the progress achieved and, if possible, to indicate something of the line of further advance. Specialists in one subject will thus be enabled to keep up with the doings of specialists in other subjects; the public that is interested in science will obtain trustworthy information in not too technical language, and teachers and students will feel less the lack of original matter and find more guidance in the use of it. By this means also the scientific workers in all parts of the Empire may obtain a meeting-ground for the exchange of information and ideas. Finally, the "practical" aspects of science are not to be neglected, and the relationship of "pure" science to industries, hygiene and so forth will be kept in view.

This first number contains twelve papers. Mr. W. J. Ashley, the Professor of Commerce in the University of Birmingham, leads off with a paper on a Science of Commerce, and the other articles belong to pure Chemistry, Agricultural Chemistry, Physical Geography as a subject for Education, Botany, Entomology, Zoology, and Geology applied to mining. The contents show, in fact, that both pure and applied science are to have fair play; and the first number promises a very high quality, practical and theoretical, to a publication to which we wish every kind of success.

In the latest number (1903-4) of that invaluable publication, the "London Topographical Record," which is the organ of the London Topographical Society, appears a paper by Mr. J. George Head on the alterations which have taken place in the northern portion of St. Marylebone in the last fifteen years. The circumstances have been exceptional, perhaps, since three railways (one of them the Great Central) and two electric light corporations have been allowed to lay hands on the district within that time; but the list of interesting houses that have been removed makes sad reading. Sarah Siddons's House, 27 Upper Baker Street, where she lived from her retirement in 1817 till her death in 1831, George IV. having promised that her windows should not be overlooked by Nash's new houses in Regent's Park; three houses of George Eliot, 10 Harewood Square, 16 Blandford Square, where she wrote "Silas Marner" and "Romola," and 21 North Bank, where she wrote "Felix Holt," "Daniel Deronda" and other works; the house, 18 St. John's Wood Road, where Landseer was living when he designed the lions in Trafalgar Square; Huxley's two houses, 14 Waverley Place (where Tyndall succeeded him) and 41 North Bank, and the house in Alpha Road where Mary Lamb ended her days.

These are only a few from Mr. Head's list, which contains also Old Harley House and the Manor House at the junction of Lisson (Lilestone) Grove and Marylebone Road. It is true that Mr. Head, with praiseworthy cheerfulness, dwells on the advantages gained by the clearing out of crowded and inferior quarters and the creation by railways and electric light works of what are to some extent open spaces. That, no doubt, is gratifying to the residents in the district, if but small consolation to those who live elsewhere. And those who remember old Paris, those who have watched Rome being cleaned and tidied and smartened up and made as nice and neat and new as Paris, will spare a sigh of regret for lost associations—the associations that help to bring the great dead vividly to the imagination.

A contributor to a contemporary has been making a pilgrimage in "The English Engadine" (as the advertisements of a certain railway company have it), and, standing before Milton's cottage at Chalfont St. Giles, "where the poet worked on the all but finished manuscript of Paradise Lost, dictating his noble lines to any one of the household who happened to be near at the time," dreamed a very pretty dream. In imagination he heard "the dictation of the organ-sounding verses which re-echo to this time in the minds of men . . ." and conjured up a vision of the way the poet's days were spent, till "the years slipped by and the time came for the return to London." At Chalfont, says our pilgrim, "he was induced by his friend, to whom he had given the manuscript of his greatest poem, to undertake the writing of Paradise Regained."

The vision as a whole is pleasing, but, unfortunately, there is a good deal of dreaming and very little fact. The poet did not "work on the all but finished manuscript of Paradise Lost" in his cottage, for the simple reason that it was finished before he went to Chalfont, and this unhappily prevented "any one of the household who happened to be near" from putting the "noble lines" on paper. Again, the years had no opportunity of slipping by as our pilgrim supposes: Milton did not stay long at Chalfont. Last, he was not "induced" by Ellwood to write "Paradise Regained," nor did he "undertake" to do so. Ellwood did not even suggest a poem. At Chalfont, being shown the manuscript of "Paradise Lost" and asked how he liked it, "I modestly but freely told him," says Ellwood, in his History, which we shall notice before long, "and after some further Discourse about it, I pleasantly said to him, Thou hast said much here of Paradise lost, but what hast thou to say of Paradise found? He made me no Answer, but sate some time in a Muse; then brake off that Discourse, and fell upon another Subject. . . . And when afterwards I went to wait on him [in London] he showed me his Second Poem . . . and in a pleasant Tone said to me, This is owing to you: for you put it into my Head by the Question you put to me at Chalfont; which before I had not thought of."

The Public Libraries Committee of Hampstead have published an exceedingly able catalogue of their central library. Although in plan and style it does not differ from the catalogues of other libraries, it has improved upon them by adding notes descriptive of almost every book catalogued. These notes as a rule run to five or six lines of small print, and they summarise the principal subject-matter or argument of the books they refer to, and point out the class of readers the authors have held in view. Thus, the readers at this library are told whether a book is technical, or popular, or non-mathematical; or that a certain preparation is necessary before they can read this or that book. The work is well done; the guidance being offered tactfully, and criticism being subordinated to careful analysis of the contents of books. The public libraries of this country would be of much greater educational value if many more catalogues of this type were issued, but the expenses of publication are considerable—the Hampstead catalogue embraces about eighteen thousand books and runs to over five hundred pages—and library authorities naturally hesitate before embarking upon enterprises of the sort. Considering that the number of important books published in English is, after all, not very large it is extraordinary that some effort has not been made by public libraries to provide the means of describing current publications once for all libraries.

Of course, descriptive lists of books are issued by many libraries, among which may be noted those at Croydon, Finsbury, Kingston-upon-Thames and West Ham, where very good periodical lists or "magazines" are published. But the majority of municipal libraries, whether able to afford magazines or not, are securing publicity for their books by means of manuscript lists or small exhibitions of books dealing with topics of a day's interest. Thus quite recently libraries have been endeavouring to interest the public in such various subjects as earthquakes, State education, Henrik Ibsen, and Spain. Every adventitious aid to pushing books is as readily taken advantage of by library authorities as by booksellers. Some people may be inclined to smile or to sneer at such semi-commercial methods of educating the public, but the librarians are right: they have to serve a section of the public whose taste for literature is confined to sensational fiction, but who may be induced, if their literary palates are tickled, to read a better class of book, in the first place out of curiosity, secondly from habit and preference. Librarians can put up with the smiles at the means they adopt, as long as they know that the desired end is in some cases achieved.

Not long ago news came from Rome that the Rome correspondent of Le Temps has discovered in a second-hand dealer's shop an Aldine Press copy of Plutarch's "Moralia," bearing the autograph, "Francisci Rabelesi Chinonen," i.e., François Rabelais of Chinon, where the author of "Pantagruel" was born. There are also a number of notes on the title-page, which appear to be in the handwriting of Rabelais. That Rabelais was indebted to Plutarch, every Rabelaisian knows; but the correspondent referred to, M. Pierre-Paul Plan, has illustrated this indebtedness by a number of comparisons, which previous commentators have overlooked. If his contention proves to be true, this will be one of the historic finds in the "twopenny box," which become rarer every year.

The most interesting among many interesting things in Mr. Tregaskis's new catalogue is René-Auguste-Constantin de Renneville's "Otia Bastiliaca," a unique work. De Renneville was the author of the famous history of the Bastille, written in this country after his release. He was imprisoned—no one quite knows why—from May 1702 till June 1713, and suffered, during much of that time, very severe treatment. One of his consolations was the composition of poems, which he wrote, with ink made of soot, wine and bone, in between the lines of a copy of "Auteurs Deguisez" (Paris, 1690), which he bought from another prisoner, the Capuchin Florent de Brandebourg. This is the volume Mr. Tregaskis now offers for sale. It was left behind by de Renneville on his release, having been previously confiscated, and formed part of the Bastille Library; after which it appears from the binding to have become the property of Louis XV.

A curious point is that Voltaire was supposed to have seen this volume and to have taken from one of de Renneville's poems, called "A Vision, or Caprice," the idea—and even more than the idea—of the seventh song in "La Henriade." Voltaire was imprisoned in the Bastille from May 1717 to May 1718. A certain M. La Baumele, who was in the Bastille about the middle of the eighteenth century, tore out the leaves containing the poem, in order to expose the plagiarism of Voltaire to the world. The leaves were discovered in his hat, and taken from him on his release. The fortunate possessor of the volume will have an interesting task in determining how far the charge is true.

A letter published recently in Germany gives an account of the death of Goethe, which differs in some respects from other accounts, though it does not necessarily contradict them. The letter was written in 1832 by a student of painting, who was an intimate friend of Goethe's family. Goethe had been laid up with a bad cold and was being nursed by his daughter-in-law, Ottilie. At seven o'clock in the morning of the day on which he died he asked her to bring him a portfolio full of diagrams, and for a while they studied optics together. Feeling much better, he began to talk about the coming spring and of his recovery. He even tried to write, numbering the pages of a manuscript. At ten o'clock he could scarcely speak, but kept on saying endearing phrases to Ottilie, who held his hand between hers. His eyes closed, but he opened them for a moment and looked affectionately at his daughter-in-law, and then died at half-past eleven. It will be seen that in the above account there is no mention of the famous phrase: "Light, more light!"

The Cheltenham Ladies' College Guild produced last week an Egyptian play called Hatshepsut, by Miss Rose Seaton, with the idea of helping those who saw it to "appreciate the labours of that earnest race of scholars, French, English and German, who have extracted from the hieroglyphs their secret, and made the dead speak." The play gave nothing more than a series of scenes in the life of the greatest of Egypt's queens, but the scenery by Mr. Sydney Herbert was well worth seeing. The dresses also were of considerable interest, as it is difficult to grasp from conventional line-drawings the form and material of the Egyptian costumes. Miss Seaton wrote the play "under circumstances of great anxiety and sorrow." From the educational point of view she was very successful, since she managed to put into it a vast amount of historical detail, for the understanding of which a book of the words, with notes, was necessary. We can only regret that an able piece of work should have been prefaced by a foolishly laudatory introduction.

If you walk from the Hammersmith Broadway down the narrow noisy street along which the trams make their strident way to the country, you will come to a winding passage called Hampshire Hog Lane, silent probably but for the echo of your own footsteps. At the very end of it stands a rambling little old house, with a porch and a garden in front where round tables and chairs are set. It is the Hampshire House Social Club for men, and here a Free Picture Exhibition is being held which is, in its way, unique. In the first room, where stands the billiard table ready for use, are the oil-paintings, lent by the artists and hung by an artist. There is a charming Camille Pissarro, Route de Versailles à Louveciennes; a portrait of William Morris, whose house stands hard by, by Sir W. B. Richmond, who opened the exhibition; a fantastic, lightly mauve landscape by Lucian Pissarro, and many other pictures, each with an individuality of its own.

So through the Bar Parlour and the Newspaper Room up strange old stairs to the Reading Room, and you find the gems of the exhibition. Three exquisite drawings by A. E. John, the drawing of a girl's head leaning forward by Watts, The Knight's Farewell in pen and ink by Burne-Jones, a wonderful lithograph by Charles Shannon in his most romantic and terrible mood—it is called The Breakwater—much beauty is in that quaintly shaped room, looking out on the fifteen allotments in the garden below.

Art was given for that;
God uses us to help each other so Lending our minds out, said Browning's Lippo Lippi, and this might be the motto of this club. It is well worth a visit for many reasons, and visitors will not fail to be delighted by the refreshing frankness with which several neatly-written placards invite them to subscribe liberally towards the expenses.

Messrs. Ernest Brown and Phillips have held during the last twelve months at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square, a series of Exhibitions of French Art which has included the work of Corot, Millet, Daubigny, Harpignies and J. E. Blanche. These are now followed by an exhibition of the work of two eminent painters—Eugène Boudin and Albert Lebourg, which was opened on Thursday last at these galleries. The famous marine painter is represented by twenty characteristic works, and it is the first occasion on which a collection of Lebourg's paintings has been shown in this country, although several exhibitions of this artist's works have been held during the last few years in Paris, where he is much esteemed. There is on view at the same time a choice collection of water-colours and drawings by deceased and living Masters of the English School.

LITERATURE

TOWARDS JOY ?

Vers La Joie. Ames Païennes, Ames Chrétiennes. Par LUCIE FÉLIX-FAURE GOYAU. (Paris: Perrin, 3 fr. 50.)

THERE may be some doubt as to the soundness of the philosophy of this book; there can be none as to the charm with which it is written and the fine taste and insight which render it a delight to read. The main thesis of the author is that the ancient pagan under a gay and light exterior concealed an undying pain and sorrow, whereas the Christian, borne down by his load of grief, weary and worn and sad, nevertheless has that inward peace which atones for all. Many will wish that they could accept the argument, but, to quote a passage from the book: "the finest gift of Prometheus to mortals is found to be illusion: 'I have hindered mortals from foreseeing their fate.' 'By what remedy hast thou cured them of this evil?' 'I have placed within them blind hopes.' . . ." It has recently been pointed out in these columns that the message of science is one antagonistic to Christian belief. The most profound students agree with M. Metchnikoff that, as far as human knowledge can go, it points to annihilation and death, and says that, as far as the individual is concerned, the hereafter must be one of darkness and oblivion. If that be so, then the consolation offered by Lucie Félix-Faure Goyau is but another of the "blind hopes" with which the compassionate Prometheus dowered mankind. But, as we have already hinted, the interest of the book does not lie in its philosophy but in the interpretation of the deepest thoughts of men. The lesson set forth is in itself good. The virtues it inculcates are those which tend to be forgotten and neglected in a world which is in danger of returning to the paganism from which it emerged. They are obedience, humility, patience, renunciation. They have formed no small part of the Christian equipment and even though science should declare that religion itself is but a fable their value to the human race will remain the same. At any rate, they are essentially modern. The author has found illustrations of them in Christina Rossetti, Eugénie De Guérin, and Saint Catherine of Siena, of whom biographical sketches close the argument; but the general interest of the book lies in its preliminary analysis of the soul of paganism. The essential thoughts of the Greeks are traced in the revelations afforded by the poetry, art, ornaments placed on tombs, epitaphs, and in those white jars, the lécythes blancs. In reality, this involves a survey of the choicest literature and the deepest thought of the period. In every direction what is found is a great depth of sadness. Homer sang that the race of men were but as leaves that the wind blows away and that return with the spring-time. A little later Moschus took up the same burden:

Ah me, when the mallows wither in the garden, and the green parsley, and the curled tendrils of the anise, on a later day they live again, and spring in another year; but we men, we, the great and mighty, or wise, when once we have died, in hollow earth we sleep, gone down into silence; a right long, and endless, and unawakening sleep.

In all there is the same note of sadness. "Mortals have no escape from destined woe," says the Chorus in the Antigone. "A man never bathes twice in the same wave," runs an old proverb; and we all know Menander's oft-quoted words: "Whom the gods love die young." Homer's idea of death has been described by M. Girard as gross and material.

Sing, goddess, the wrath of Achilles Peleus' son, the vain wrath that brought on the Achæans woes innumerable, and hurled down into Hades many strong souls of heroes, and gave themselves to be a prey to dogs and all winged fowls.

The commentator goes on:

Themselves, that is, their body with their blood, their nerves and the principles and agents of their strength; we must add even their passions and their intellect. For see what is the nature of those souls who run to the call of Ulysses. Before they have drunk the blood of the victims, they are without knowledge and without remembrance, incorporeal images of beings who once existed. It is this blood which, poured into their faded limbs, rekindles in them for a few moments feeling and intelligence. Real existence is attached, then, to the body; separation from it is no deliverance, it is a diminution scarcely short of annihilation.

Mr. Swinburne has tried to render that Greek idea of the soul in "Atalanta in Calydon," where he says:

But thou, O Mother,
The dreamer of dreams,
Wilt thou bring forth another
To feel the sun's beams

When I move among shadows a shadow, and wail by impassable streams?

The idea is borne out by figures on the lécythes blancs. As the author says:

This poor little shuddering and naked thing that the soul then seems to be, murmurs with a vague wail that is stifled by the tomb. It is represented on the beautiful white jars with a gracious elegance it appears there in the shape of a little winged figure which is flying away.

The clear daylight of Greece or of Sicily does not shine on the fatulous mead of asphodels where the poets placed their dead. The monuments stood on the margin of the sea, by the roadside, under the myrtles and the oleanders, in the sunshine they loved. Their epitaphs generally attested their desire to mingle again with life. Women are continually shown weeping at these memorials. M. Pottier, who has made a study of the Greek white jars, says that generally their attitudes are more pathetic and more violent than in other scenes of grief. The description of the figures deserves to be quoted:

Two spirits, Hypnos and Thanatos, appear to receive the corpses from the hands of the mourners. Hypnos and Thanatos, sleep and death, twin sons of the night, both winged, one black and the other white. . . . To take the soul to the dwellings of Hades, Hermes, Psychopompe and the ferryman Charon also appear. . . . Little winged figures, images of the flying soul, hover, we might say, on the jars and reproduce the sorrowful features of the bystanders. No one tries to rebel against fate, and we remember Homer's verse: "The gods have endowed man with a patient heart."

The very essence of the Greek idea of the soul is conveyed in the famous lines of the Emperor Hadrian:

Animula, vagula, blandula,
Hospes comesque corporis,
Quae nunc abibis in loca,
Pallidula, rigida, nudula?

If we look at the epitaphs we find them at least in perfect harmony with this:

Hail, Earth, our common mother. Weigh not too heavily on Oesigenes; he has weighed but lightly upon thee.

A modern cemetery shows us the most extraordinarily vulgar exhibition of sentiment that can be imagined, in the epitaphs commonly placed on the tombs of little children. The Greeks loved their children too, but how different is the epitaph:

The little girl went away before her time, in her seventh year, to Hades whither she preceded many companions of her own age, wishing, unhappy one! to see her little brother of twenty months, a tiny child who had suffered pitiless death. Alas! Peristeris, mark for so much affliction, what heavy trials a god always ready to impose on men!

Perhaps the most pathetic epitaph quoted is the brief one: "I am the tomb of her who was called Glauce." We knew nothing of her who was called Glauce, as we knew nothing of those who loved to call her so. The name of a forgotten being, says our author, is it not an empty emblem, an indecipherable enigma? The epitaph on the ship-wrecked sailors foretells oblivion:

Man, husband your life. In evil weather hoist not your sail: at the best, life is not very long! Unfortunate Cleonice, you set sail in utmost haste towards opulent Thasos, an adventurer from Coele-Syria; you crossed the sea what time the Pleiades fall, and with the Pleiades thou art fallen for ever.

Our author points out that the smiling Ionian sea, the azure Tyrrhene, and the blue Aegean are all alike, the faithless sea of mourning and of funerals.

Sailors [says another inscription], why do you bury me near the sea? . . . I tremble at the sound of the waves, the cause of my death. Yet, even so, greeting and joy to you who had pity on Nicetas.

It would be easy to multiply the evidence of that sadness with which the Greeks met death. "There is lacking to all," says our author, "even after so many troubles and burdens, the seal of the Christian sepulchres whose calmness spreads from death into life: the Requiescat in pace." But we hear the voice of one murmuring: "Is this not another of the espérances aveugles?"

In Roman literature we find but an echo of the Greek, and the author has not done badly in taking Lucretius and Horace as its exponents. We need not follow the argument too closely. If Lucie Félix-Faure Goyau had made the same researches into the deepest and most heartfelt poetry of the last two thousand years, she would have had but the same tale to tell. The greatest of our poets has branded, as with red-hot irons, such sentences as these on the human memory: "Life . . . is a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing." "We are such stuff as dreams are made on, and our little life is rounded with a sleep." While Christianity endures, it must carry with it a belief in the resurrection, and our memorials of the dead bear a testimony—which is very frequently conventional though it may often be sincere—to this faith and hope, but at bottom there seems always to have been a fear, if not a consciousness, that oblivion is waiting for souls. Even a man of such simple and fine piety as George Herbert, when he came to talk of going down to the dust, used exactly the same language as might have been employed by the most pagan of the ancient Greeks. If modern literature were subjected to the same research that has been expended on the old, it would be found that human nature has possessed at all times the same doubts and hopes and fears; yet it cannot but be admitted that the Christian faith contains the best wisdom that mankind has yet developed. It has sustained those who were inclined to despond, given hope to the despairing, refreshment to the sad and weary; nor could three more brilliant examples of its influence have been chosen than those of which our author has made so careful a study. Each conquered in her place and in her own way—Christina Rossetti, Eugénie de Guérin, and St. Catherine of Sienna. They are three names well worthy of being joined together.

THE OFFICIAL HISTORY OF THE WAR IN SOUTH AFRICA

History of the War in South Africa, 1899-1902. Compiled by direction of his Majesty's Government by Major-General Sir FREDERICK MAURICE, K.C.B., with a staff of officers. Vol. i. (Hurst & Blackett, 17s. 6d. net.)

It is just three years since Sir Frederick Maurice took over the task of compiling the official history of the war, and he tells us in the preface that Colonel Henderson had not then written either narrative of, or comments on, the military operations. The delay in publication is apparently due to the fact that the late Government did not decide until November of last year that it was undesirable to discuss in the history:

any questions that had been at issue between them and the rulers of the two republics, or any points that had been in dispute at home, and to confine this history [sic] to the military contest.

This decision was undoubtedly wise, but if it had been made earlier there would have been less cause for complaint of the historians, who have, for no fault of their own, through delay, incurred much censure. The volume deals with the campaign on the Natal side up to Colenso; in the East of Cape Colony—Gatacre's country, up to Stormberg; in the centre of Cape Colony, French's operations round Colesberg up to the time when he joined Lord Roberts's main army; in the western part of the theatre of war, Lord Methuen's four big fights; and Lord Roberts's arrival at Cape Town and his re-organisation and concentration on the Modder for the relief of Kimberley and invasion of the Orange Free State.

The early chapters of the volume deal with the preparation for, and outbreak of, war; the theatre of war; the armies of the belligerents and the Navy in the Boer War. These chapters are good of their kind, but that which deals with the British Army appears to be a short adaptation of part of the Times History chapter on the British military system. That on the Navy is more original, but like many other parts of the book offers platitudes instead of criticism. The following is a sample:

Happily our public services, both civil and military, have grown up in the traditions that each branch and department, while it has special grooves in which its own particular duty runs, is at all times on the look-out to help any other department. The Navy and Army are no strangers to this practice of mutual aid. Their special duties have in times past so often led to each helping the other in some way, that perhaps there exists between them in a rather special degree that feeling of comradeship which is engendered by sharing the same duties and the same perils and hardships; just as boys who have gone through the same mill at school, and got into and out of the same scrapes together, are undoubtedly imbued with an esprit de corps which is often a valuable possession in after-life.

This pretty sentiment should be particularly gratifying to the Treasury, which naturally is included as one of those civil public services which is always so friendly with the War Office: the acknowledgment is all the more graceful because so much money has been spent on the production of this book.

It is impossible to criticise in detail a volume which covers so large a period of the operations, but the general impression obtained from reading it is that it is very solid and non-committal. It is the very antithesis of the German staff history, in which criticism of the operations is frequent, though often based on an inadequate knowledge of the facts, and it cannot, of course, be compared with the Times history in which every body and thing is regarded, and rightly, as a fair object for criticism. The result is that here we get a large quantity of facts, and little more than facts. Occasionally, however, there is noticeable a tendency to present the facts in the most favourable light; as an example may be quoted two extracts bearing on Colonel Baden-Powell's mission:

(I.) p. 39. The War Office despatched Col. R. S. S. Baden-Powell, with a staff of special service officers, to organise a force in southern Rhodesia. It was hoped that, in the event of war, his column might detain a portion of the Boer commandos in that quarter, since its position threatened the northern Transvaal. To his task was subsequently added the organisation of a mounted infantry corps which, based on Mafeking, might similarly hold back the burghers of the western districts of the South African Republic.

(II.) p. 44. At Mafeking it was realised that Col. Baden-Powell's troops would be unable to do more than protect the large quantities of stores accumulated by merchants at that station against the formidable Boer force which was concentrating for attack upon it. Nevertheless, by so doing, Baden-Powell would fulfil the rôle assigned to him, since he would prevent large numbers of the enemy from engaging in the serious invasion of the exposed frontier territories of Cape Colony.

These statements, we maintain, are incorrect because Baden-Powell was meant to take an offensive part in the war: that he was ultimately instrumental in "containing" large numbers of the enemy for a considerable time has nothing to do with the question. It is true that his part was, as carried out, most successful, but it was not "the rôle assigned to him," which was a sort of roving commission to make raids in the American fashion on the enemy. The fault lay not with Baden-Powell but with the original scheme, which did not provide him with a force large enough for the purpose of raiding. To surmise facts like this is a common habit, and it is this practice which leads even official historians to write of "untoward events" without explaining the causes which made those events untoward. It is possible, in spite of this, to feel a keen sympathy with the historian, since he sent proofs to all the principal actors of the war, so that "much fresh evidence has been received and embodied:" we can imagine also that a good deal of what had been written was excised by the same actors, and that the editor had to respect their wishes. If this is the case, we can understand the real meaning of the word "compiled" on the title-page.

The prospectus of the history says that "the work is something more than a dull record of fact," and adds that "comparisons are drawn from the military history of both Great Britain and America, and the influence of character, both individual and national, on the course of events receives due attention." We regret that we are unable to agree with the prospectus. The record is not dull, but the history is little more than a record. The facts, being official, are presumably correct as far as they go, but even if more accurate, which for several reasons they should be, than those in the Times history, they are not presented in so picturesque a manner. It is not only criticism and historical parallels that we miss, but explanations. The account of Magersfontein is typical. We have here no explanation of Lord Methuen's inactivity during the eleven days before the battle. Of criticism there is nothing, which is not to be wondered at, since the chief performer is still on the active list; but the battle was, after all, one of the most controversial episodes in the war. Tacked on at the end of the chapter is a nice little note about the occupation of the reverse slope of a hill, which is very interesting in its way and of that allusive kind which would win marks in an examination. Why the Highland brigade was not supported directly it was known that the night attack had failed; why no provision had been made for the possible failure of the attack which was to form the pivot of the whole plan of operations; what was the reason for the extraordinary order to Colville—and so on: there are a dozen disputed points about the fight to which the official historian turns a deaf ear. And where is the promised comment and comparison? Here was a chance for General Maurice to show his knowledge, but even that authority on the Franco-German War has refrained from introducing anything obvious about the Guards at St. Privat when he is writing of Magersfontein. Of the battle of Colenso the only criticism is, apparently, that of Sir Redvers Buller himself, that "the plan for the passage of the Tugela was undoubtedly so hazardous that only the most exact sequence of the phases of its execution could have brought it to a successful issue." Mr. Amery's remark on the battle is by now proverbial: "It was the general who, at the critical moment, failed his troops." The German official history said much the same thing; and it would be impossible, we should have imagined, for the editor of this book to have abstained from comment. As General Maurice, however, finds no fault with Sir Redvers Buller's remark, he presumably approves the tactics of the battle. Here, surely, was scope for criticism, but the fact that the military interest of the war is chiefly tactical does not seem to be appreciated in Pall Mall. We begin to wonder for whom the history is intended. Not for the civilian, surely; because for him the inferences from the facts must be drawn: he wants to know why a battle was lost and why a movement was made. Nor can it be for the soldier: there is no need to explain to him the meaning of terms like "dead-ground," and he, too, might like guidance in matters tactical from so distinguished an officer as the official historian.

The book itself is wonderfully cheap, and the portfolio of good maps and sketches supplied with it is a valuable addition to our knowledge. That the lessons of the war have not yet been taken to heart is shown by a note at the beginning of the volume in connection with the maps, from which we learn that no systematic, detailed survey has ever been made by any of the South African colonies or states, and that most of the existing maps are of little military use. If the history had been up to the level of the maps it would have been a delightful book; but we hope for better things when the historians get into their stride. The next volume deals, inter alia, with Paardeberg, Sannah's Post, Ladysmith, and Spion Kop, so perhaps we shall find in it the numerous comments promised to the reader, adorned with all the metaphors and epithets deleted from the manuscript of volume i.

THE ART OF APPRECIATION

Whistler and Others. By FREDERICK WEDMORE. (Pitman, 6s. net.)

In a brief appreciation of Ruskin, which is decidedly not the least welcome contribution to this volume of collected essays, Mr. Wedmore observes:

It has been said . . . that if you asked painters whether he was a critic of Painting, they would say: "No: he was perhaps a critic of Architecture"; and if you asked architects whether he was a critic of Architecture, they would say: "No: but perhaps he was a critic of Painting." . . . But you will not find the Writer who shall tell you that Ruskin knew little about writing.

Of the critical writings of Mr. Wedmore similar remarks have been made. Painters will acknowledge him to be an authority on etching; etchers will say: "Yes; he knows something about states, but he probably excels as a critic of painting." Again, a more generous, and possibly a more just estimation of Mr. Wedmore's genius will come from students of letters who will agree: "Of the things said we know nothing; but from the way in which they are said, from the delicate phrasing, and fastidiously chosen epithet we know the artist in prose."

It is true that Mr. Wedmore rejects "the craftsman's pretension to be the judge without appeal, as to who is the real critic of his particular craft," and by this rejection he shows that it is not for the craftsman he writes, as R. A. M. Stevenson did. Neither does he write for the crowd, for the "average citizen," to whose opinions about art Mr. Wedmore is "not inclined to attach any overweening importance."

It would be a satisfaction to suppose that as Time passed, as opportunities increased, there was amongst the large English public some appreciable progress in tasteful perception and in sincere and personal enjoyment of the things of Art. Honestly, I cannot aver that this satisfaction is mine. There is something in our Race that makes it a difficulty to extract either from the admitted bourgeois or the "cultivated" person who has rushed to Sienna or the Lombard plains, any judgment upon Art comparable in sagacity or clearness with that of the first artisan you may collar in the first French provincial Museum.

Between the crowd and the craftsmen comes the army of connoisseurs, and it is for the better sort of connoisseur, the man who prizes beauty and expressiveness above rarity and monetary value, that Mr. Wedmore writes. In the essay on "The Field of the Print Collector" he is seen at his best, gently chiding the present cult of the coloured engraving, "the spoilt Morland, the enfeebled Wheatley, the sugary Bartolozzi, meretricious and elegant," paternally advising the collector to let be this "prettyish, momentarily engaging, easily-tired-of thing," and firmly exhorting him to turn to better ways. He dwells briefly, but suggestively, on the more solid qualities of Jacquemart, Bega, Hollar, Ribot, Jongkind, and many another sterling etcher whose works are within the reach of but modestly furnished purses. Soothingly he points out that examples of the great Dutchman are not beyond the scope of moderate means:

Is it not a welcome thought, a grateful, satisfactory reflection, that if there are certain prints of Rembrandt's, which—in given states at all events—cost, each of them, the price of a small house, or the price of a farm in Wiltshire, there are also certain prints of his, good and desirable, which cost, each of them, only the price of a second-rate bicycle, of a hired brougham to go to three parties, or a Box to see Miss Adeline Genée or Miss Gabrielle Ray?

In this field of criticism Mr. Wedmore is without a peer, but it is only fair to add that, if he rarely condescends to analyse those technical qualities which are the be-all and the end-all of the craftsman, it is not that he is impervious to their charm, but because these come within the region of facts and Mr. Wedmore's aim is to contribute ideas rather than facts. Throughout these papers, many of them extending to little over a page, Mr. Wedmore shows his intense love of beauty, his just appreciation of the fit. His critical method is not exhaustive but suggestive, and no inventory of qualities could so stimulate the imagination as one of his pregnant summaries. "The warm correctness of Fantin's draughtsmanship" . . . "Water-colour drawing, though it has no reason to be petty, has no permission to be huge." . . . "Enjoying a great inheritance from the Venetians and a little legacy from Boucher" (of Etty)—these are pronouncements whose nicety will commend them to craftsmen no less than to amateurs.

The appreciation of Whistler, to which precedence is given in the book as well as in the title, is not the most satisfying of these essays, but the genius of this artist was so complex and so various that it is impossible to treat of it adequately in so limited a space. Mr. Wedmore, however, sets the reader on the right road, touching on Whistler's pre-occupation with the decorative side of painting, his "nature essentially aristocratic," his beautifying acceptance of "the very things that seem most commonplace to commonplace people," his "own special revelation of character, through pose, instead of through feature," and, naturally, dwelling at greater length on those etchings which will "lie unabashed for ever by the side of the noblest Rembrandts." Fantin-Latour, Crome, Cotman, Hine, Brabazon, Constable and Lucas—the art of all these receives sympathetic and suggestive treatment, while Boudin inspires Mr. Wedmore to an entrancing essay, in which discreet biography and critical appreciation are flawlessly blended. But the keynote to Mr. Wedmore's critical outlook is given best of all in a mere note on "Still life," where, replying to those who say that real flowers, "the actual things," must be better than painted flowers, he solemnly avers:

But they forget that in the picture, wise men have the things—their charm at least—and the Art beside the things—the painter's own great way of looking at and rendering them—a humble truth which I commend to the reflection of those who do not quite understand that in Art that which endures and vivifies is the temperament of the artist.

A PRINCE OF GOD

The Ascent of Mount Carmel. By ST. JOHN of the Cross. Translated by DAVID LEWIS. With a prefatory essay by BENEDICT ZIMMERMANN, O.C.D. (Thomas Baker, 7s. 6d.)

To read Saint John of the Cross attentively and intelligently—remembering that he is an expert in the science of God, and therefore to be listened to, not criticised—is to find oneself presently regarding the entire range of existence at a very strange angle. From this point of view there is but one supreme reality, which is God; other things share only in that reality in proportion as they are in adjusted relations with Him, and according to the degree in which they transmit His light. He is Immanent certainly, but He is Transcendent also. The most direct way, therefore, by which He may be approached and His reality attained, is to pass as swiftly as possible from the dominion of all things relative; and the first step of this process is to detach the soul from every lingering affection towards the things of sense, from every natural impulse, from every preference for one thing more than another; the purgation must be complete and unreserved, since evil lies not in the creature but in desire. But this is only the initial step in the terrible ascent of Carmel; for it brings the soul to the region of thought and imagination, where anthropomorphic gods are fashioned and divine attributes are pictured under symbols of human action.

No knowledge, therefore, and no conceptions in this mortal life can serve as proximate means of this high union of the love of God. All that the understanding may comprehend; all that the will may be satisfied with; and all that the imagination may conceive, is most unlike to God, and most disproportionate to Him.

This realm, then, too, must be traversed and left behind, giving place to the "dark night of faith." And even here the soul must not be content, for this dark region is pierced sometimes by gleams of light—thrills that radiate from the God who hides Himself, taking shape, it may be, in locutions or visions presented to the faculties of the purified soul. But even these spiritual favours and divine visitations must but be tasted and left, for the Lord is neither in the fire nor the earthquake nor the wind, though they come from Him. The soul must not linger here, that desires perfection itself.

Would that I could persuade spiritual persons that the way of God consisteth not in the multiplicity of meditations, songs of devotion or sweetness, though these may be necessary for beginners, but . . . in knowing how to deny themselves in earnest, inwardly and outwardly, giving themselves up to suffer for Christ's sake, and annihilating themselves utterly.

Finally, then, from this last "obscure night," upborne by divine action, in a supreme flight the naked, blind, dumb and deaf soul soars into that Reality itself towards which material things, imaginative symbols and spiritual presentations bear no adequate proportion, and is at peace.

In that happy night, in secret seen of none, seeing nought myself, without other light or guide, save that which in my heart was burning; That light guided me more surely than the noonday sun, to the place where He was waiting for me, Whom I knew well, and where none appeared. . . . As His hair floated in the breeze that blew from the turret, He struck me on the neck with His gentle hand, and all sensation left me. I continued in oblivion lost; my head was resting on my love; lost to all things and myself: And, amid the lilies forgotten, threw all my cares away.

Yet with this master of the mystical life there is none of that individualism that has wrecked so many, no personal arrogance or self-sufficiency.

I trust neither to experience nor to knowledge, for both may mislead me; but solely to the Scriptures. . . . If through ignorance I should err, it is not my intention to depart from the sound doctrine of our holy mother the Catholic Church. I resign myself absolutely to her light.

Neither is there that mistaken Puritanism which, because it perceives that the things of sense are not ends in themselves, rejects them altogether.

A devout man grounds his devotion chiefly on the invisible, he requires but few images. . . . [He] makes use of images and oratories, yet it is only as it were in passing, and the mind at once rests in God, forgetting all sensible objects.

The soul, then, may only poise itself on such material and imaginative aids, as a bird crossing the sea may perch for an instant on some swaying mast in readiness for the further flight. One exception only is made:

This deliberate forgetfulness and rejection of all knowledge and of forms must never be extended to Christ and His Sacred Humanity. Sometimes, indeed, in the height of contemplation and pure intuition of the divinity, the soul does not remember the Sacred Humanity . . . but, for all this, studiously to forget it is by no means right; for the contemplation of the Sacred Humanity . . . will keep us to all good, and it is by It that we shall ascend most easily to the highest state of union.

Neither, then, has this doctrine anything in common with the spiritual suicide of Nirvana, for God Himself, the supreme and unique Being in whom souls find their life and their highest personal consciousness, was Himself Incarnate for their sakes.

Christ is the Way . . . and the way [for us] is to die to our natural self in all that relates to sense and spirit . . . in imitation of Christ, for He is our light and our example. . . . And when [the spiritual man] shall have been brought to nothing, when his humility is perfect, then will take place the union of the soul and God, which is the highest and noblest estate attainable in this life. This consisteth not in spiritual refreshments, sweetness or sentiments, but in the living death of the cross, sensually and spiritually, outwardly and inwardly.

This then, in brief, is the appalling doctrine of Saint John of the Cross—a doctrine which teaches us that the way to perfection lies in a mortification of which probably not one in ten thousand persons has ever dreamed—a mortification of not only the things of sense—this is but the initial step—but a renouncing first of all aids of the imagination, all devout fancies and symbolisms, and finally of even the high mystical communications which take place between God and the soaring soul. Nothing, says John, with cruel logic, can satisfy the soul that has set out on the divine quest, save the object of that quest, which is God as He is, not as He acts. The unutterable song of the redeemed, the radiations from the Throne of Glory, even the very utterances of God Himself—these are no more than shadows and reflections to be traversed and left behind by the soul that would lose herself in Him.

Yet this man practised what he preached, and upon him the Mother of Saints has set her seal that he attained what he desired. We seem to see him now, across three hundred years, imprisoned in soul as well as in body, or, rather, utterly free in both. Whether he is in his dungeon, staring at the motes that dance in the narrow sunbeam, and learning from them that the purer the light the less can it be perceived, or whether he is talking slowly with Teresa through the grating, with long silences—this makes no difference; for in either place, or bowed in his plain silent oratory, he looks out with blind and bloodshot eyes on and beyond the world which he has conquered, emaciated, scarred, gigantic, terribly alone, and, as it were, aghast at the God whom he loves so passionately.

No wonder [writes a modern mystic] the Jew held the vision of God to mean death, and the Gentile believed that to enter into relations with Him was the beginning of madness. . . . Religious suffering is distinguished from other suffering, in that it is inevitably involved in the relation itself. Man is to live in a medium that conflicts with his essential nature: a finite being is to live in the infinite; yet he is here a fish upon dry land.

This, then, is something very different from the drawing-room quietism of our own day, so much entangled as it is with psychical sensation, so dependent on mood and temperament and religiosity, so greedy of experiences and preternatural communications. Yet, in spite of our comfortable insistence that all things work together for good, and that the artist following his art, and the lover his beloved, are alike laying hold of God, if we have even a touch of devout humility, we are absolutely silent as we look on this man alone with the Alone. We can no more criticise or disagree than we can disagree with a supreme mountain. There it is, sublime and self-contained, in a light so pure that it appears to us as darkness, far above the warring clouds of philosophy and systems of thought. And we—we are like very little blind beetles—the smaller the better—very busy at our mud-holes and the gathering of twigs and fragments of edible dirt. We may say—and most of us do—that that life is not for us, that we do not aim at such perfection; we may prefer to turn to where Teresa sits with her human laughter and shrewdness veiling her burning heart, or follow on beneath Francis as he sings to Brother Sun and Sister Moon, jeering at, rather than hating Brother Ass on whom he rides; or we may turn to Mother Julian who “saw God in a point” and all that is made, of the size of a “hazel-nut as round as a ball.” We may prefer to picture eternity in terms of time, rather than time in terms of eternity. Or we may be content with even less than this, and cling to our idols, our anthropomorphism, our refracted lights, our rosy sunsets and the song of birds and running water, our timid hopes and pious pictures. But we do not criticise Saint John of the Cross: for, as we look at this gaunt Carmelite sitting up there in the space and silence, among his icy lilies and beneath his windy turret, we see that he sees something of which we can scarcely bear the reflected reflection—that through his ears pass unregarded words from God that we would die sooner than hear, and that that seemingly frozen and bloodless heart is instinct with an ichor that is an ecstatic torment even to think upon. And if we do not understand him as he speaks, is that any wonder, when we consider what it is of which he speaks, and our own heaviness, and the great winds that blow on the peaks where he sits?

And he—what does he think of us? Indeed, he does not despise us, for we “also are His offspring”: he tells us in an aside or two that not all can aspire to perfection; he implies that there is room for “beginners” in God’s world, and that little children who do even less than their best have also a claim upon His Heart. But, frankly, he is not interested in us; and this is as it should be, for, after all, we are not interesting.

CHATTERTON

The Complete Poetical Works of Thomas Chatterton. Edited by H. D. ROBERTS. In 2 vols. (Routledge, The Muses’ Library, 1s. and 2s. net each.)

THE long promised Chatterton has now been added to this strongly bound and marvellously cheap series. Each of the early editions of Chatterton’s works possessed an independent interest due to the fact that each one contained new and not previously published matter. Of late years it has been assumed that all material was exhausted, and recent editors have been contented to reprint from the old versions. Mr. H. D. Roberts, who edits the present collection, has set up a higher and proper standard to work to, and, although he has not always accomplished his object of collating his text with the original manuscript or, when that was not feasible, of checking it by the earliest printed copy, he has made some original research, and in certain instances has been enabled to revise, if not improve, the text of his predecessors. From the British Museum manuscript of “The Revenge” he has recovered two additional lines and new readings of a few others. These revisions must not be accepted as proof that previous editors have been careless: they have resorted to other copies, Chatterton having been accustomed to make variations in the transcripts he gave to different people.

There are, also, it should be stated, poems by Chatterton in existence which are not included in the present or any other collection, whilst some of the pieces continually reprinted as by him are not his. Some portions of “Amphitryon,” which Mr. Roberts has not included in the present collection, and believes never to have been printed, were published in Harper’s Magazine for July 1883, as were extracts from other poems with which he does not appear to be acquainted.

The Rowley poems, unquestionably the most important part of Chatterton’s works, fill the second volume of this collection, and in accordance with the method adopted by his more recent predecessors are given by Mr. Roberts in a modernised version of the Chattertonian dialect. Naturally, Mr. Roberts is chiefly indebted to Professor Skeat for his translation, and, like that authority, is frequently obliged to leave many of Chatterton’s words in their original form. If it were possible always to have Chatterton’s own manuscript copies of the Rowley pieces, together with the glossaries he made for them, readers would undoubtedly prefer them as he wrote them to any modernised versions editors could produce; but, as nearly all the copies now procurable have been disfigured by the clumsy emendations of their transcribers, these modernisations are defensible. Many of the poems, as they have reached us, are not in the language or form Chatterton gave them. The boy’s associates, Catcott and Barrett, not deeming the “Rowleys” archaic-looking enough, disguised their transcripts, which are now the only authority for these poems, in pseudo-antique spelling. A manuscript, purporting to be Chatterton’s original sketch of “Ælla,” recently sold for a very large sum of money, on the assumption that it was in Chatterton’s own handwriting, but it was, apparently, written by William Barrett, author of a notorious “History of Bristol.” Some words in the margin of the manuscript, if not written by Chatterton himself, were a good imitation of his calligraphy. The boy poet made use of three kinds of strange or unusual words: genuine archaic words correctly employed; other ancient words, the meaning of which he misunderstood and, therefore, used incorrectly, and, thirdly, words he invented. The suppression or alteration of these various words frequently robs his poetry of much of its original charm.

We may be grateful to Mr. Roberts for what he has done without being obliged to agree with all his comments or statements. He has been misinformed that “the present edition has followed the earliest printed copy as regards text,” of “The Execution of Sir Charles Bawdin,” and there was no need to animadvert upon Chatterton’s grammar because he used a singular verb with plural substantives, as by so writing he consistently followed the practice of the older English authors. Mr. Roberts disclaims furnishing anything new or original in his “Biographical Introduction,” but it is unfortunate that he has resorted to doubtful or prejudiced sources for a portion of his information. There does not appear to be any trustworthy evidence that the poet’s father was dissipated; it is unjust to say that, when very young, Chatterton “developed a habit” of speaking untruthfully because an imaginative woman related a silly tale of his childhood; that the lad “made few friends,” is contrary to evidence, and it is not a fact that at the age of fifteen “the object of his affections” was a Miss Rumsey. He wrote verses to that girl, as he did to other girls of his circle, but his acquaintance with her was made avowedly with the hope that female society “might soften the austerity of temper study had occasioned.” What a confession from a boy of fifteen! To style George Catcott a victim of Chatterton is to reverse facts: the unfortunate lad, like his mother later, was victimised by Catcott, who obtained riches and reputation from the poet’s labours. Both Catcott and Barrett reaped where Chatterton had sown. No one who had made a thorough investigation of the facts regarding Walpole’s treatment of Chatterton could possibly arrive at the conclusion that the poet had received “undeserved blame.”

The “Bibliography” is useful as far as it goes, but is capable of considerable extension.

RASH JUDGMENT

METHOUGHT I saw a mountain-wall upthrown,
Interminably confronting boundless space,
With tangled forest-belts about its base,
Wherethrough grave men toil vastly, each alone,
To cleave a little pathway of his own;
And forthrights some, and some menders trace,
But late or soon they end in every case
Blocked blankly by that monstrous bulk of stone.

And this turns back thereon, and at his ease
Makes boast: I leave behind all barriers.
And that smites head on rock, and when he sees Strange gleams before his eyes, anon avers
'Tis light from Heaven. Quoth I: What fools are these?
Said one: Dost thou call fools, Philosophers?

SPELLING REFORM

EVER since picture-writing made way for sound-writing—the hieroglyphic system of Egyptian priests for the alphabet of Phœnician traders—the attempt has been made to represent the sounds of living speech by graphic symbols. The practical purpose of every system of writing, of syllabary or alphabet, has been to represent as far possible the sounds of living speech—to be phonetic. But such are the infinite shades and varieties of the sounds which issue from the human larynx, such is the ceaseless movement of speech from generation to generation of living men, that this heroic attempt has ever met with only a partial success. No language has ever had a system of writing which is perfectly phonetic. Spelling is phonetic to a certain extent in varying measure in every language that uses an alphabet, even in modern English. But it must be admitted that especially in our vowel notation we have gone far astray from phonetic righteousness. For instance, we have seven distinct ways of representing in writing the vowel-sound in “go”: (1) cold; (2) toe; (3) loaf; (4) mould; (5) dough; (6) grow; (7) sew. The short vowel in “tin” is represented by seven distinct symbols: (1) fish, (2) sieve, (3) English; (4) been, (5) busy, (6) wych (elm), (7) women. This must be allowed to be a superfluity of means to arrive at one simple end—one vowel-sound. Then, again, in our modern English writing one symbol has many phonetic values. The letter “a” may be pronounced eight different ways: (1) black, (2) many, (3) wasp, (4) path, (5) star, (6) lady, (7) salt, (8) care. In the presence of such an apparently chaotic condition of spelling as these facts show, it is not surprising that men who have caught a vision of the Beauty of Law, and are shocked at such proofs of utter lawlessness should look about, if by any means they may draw attention to the disease, if by any means they may devise a remedy. We have had many Prophets of Reform, but hitherto they have spoken in the wilderness, and but few have gone out to hear them. I need now only mention the names of Max Müller, Sweet, and Skeat, whose words must always have weight in the world of Science and of Letters. Max Müller was an ardent advocate of Phonetic Reform, and, with the poetic idealism that ever characterised him, expressed himself confident in the victory of the cause, feeling convinced of the truth and reasonableness of the principles on which that reform rests. He never doubted that just as men had, from their innate regard for truth and reason, consented to part with all they held most dear and sacred, whether corn-laws, or Stuart dynasties, or Papal legates, or heathen idols, so there was a good time coming when they would give up “the present effete and corrupt orthography.” He would not allow himself to be alarmed even by Mr. Pitman’s (afterwards Sir Isaac Pitman’s) “Fonetic Nuz.” He was not disturbed at all by the etymological argument urged so eloquently by Archbishop Trench, for, as the professor argued with much cogency: “if our spelling followed strictly and unswervingly the pronunciation of words, it would in reality be of greater help to the critical student of language than the present uncertain and unscientific mode of writing.” Dr. Sweet says: “our present spelling is in many particulars a far from trustworthy guide in etymology and often entirely falsifies history,” and he gives as instances such spellings as island, author, delight, sovereign. “What is wanted [he says] is a simple, consistent, and above all elastic spelling, which, within certain practical limits, will adapt itself to every change of pronunciation.” Dr. Sweet mentions, one very important result of a phonetic system and, particularly, of a return to the Roman values of the vowels: it would restore the original harmony of the English with the Continental values of the letters, which would much facilitate the acquisition of English by foreigners, and of foreign languages by Englishmen. Professor Skeat’s views on this important subject may be seen in his paper “The Problem of Spelling Reform” read at a meeting of the British Academy a few weeks ago. The learned professor points out two great advantages which would certainly result even from a moderate instalment of spelling reform: the saving of many thousands of pounds in the printing of books in consequence of the disuse of a large number of useless letters, and, secondly, the simplification of the task of learning to read, which would bring about a considerable shortening of time in achieving that task, and consequently the saving of considerable sums of money to the payer of rates and taxes.

From what has been said it may be inferred that there is a general agreement among scholars on the importance, I might almost say the necessity, of some measure of spelling reform; but when we come to the question of the measure or extent or method, to the task of putting the principle into practice, we find that opinions differ. Some scholars advocate a policy of “thorough,” of rigour and vigour, others are in favour of “small instalments of spelling reform,” and make suggestions of “partial reforms.” Dr. Sweet has given us in his “Handbook of Phonetics,” and in his “Elementarbuch des gesprochenen Englisch,” varieties of a perfectly consistent system of phonetic spelling, which generally goes by the name of Romic. Dr. Skeat is content to ask for the adoption of “small instalments.” Dr. Sweet’s Romic scheme may be conveniently consulted in Skeat’s “Principles of English Etymology,” p. 336. On p. 118 of Sweet’s “Handbook” the anxious inquirer will find a specimen of Romic spelling which he may consult with advantage. He will find no difficulty in reading the piece which I copy out if he is familiar with the poem:

Swiftle waok ouvædhæ westæn weiv
spiritæv nait,
autævdhæ miste iystæn keiv, whær aoldhæ loqænd loun dei lait
dhau wouvest drymzæv joien fiæ, whic meikdhiv terebælæn diæ, swiftbiydhæi flait

It cannot be denied that this has the merit of fearless consistency. Let us now examine Professor Skeat’s “small instalments,” “a few simple cases in which our spelling might be improved.” They had all been duly noted by Dr. Sweet in a paper which he wrote with the title of “Partial Corections of English Spellings aproovd of by the Philological Society, 1881.” Professor Skeat’s principal suggestion is that useless letters should be omitted, e.g., the e in such words as have, give, above, come, freeze, little, double, icicle, heart, sieve (both e’s), pulled, driven, written; the a in breadth, meadow, head, breakfast, and the like; the o in leopard, jeopardy, flourish, journey, touch, courage, cousin; the u in honour, labour; the u in harangue, tongue, decalogue and the like; the b in debt, lamb, limb, numb, thumb; the simplification of the double consonant in add, odd, egg, full, stiff, battle, traveller, affair, arrive, command. The professor also recommends the restoration of the Tudor forms (with oo) in lose, move, improve, and the correction of wrong spellings, such as ache (which should be ake), anchor (which should be anker) and choir, which should invariably be spelt quire.

I cannot see how it would be possible for any reasonable being to find fault with any of these suggestions, but the question must be asked: Is there any probability that such suggestions, although offered by one so competent to offer them as Professor Skeat, will have any practical effect? It seems to me very likely that "partial reforms" such as these will be acceptable to no one. They will not satisfy the student of language or the practical linguist, because they leave so many inconsistencies and contradictions untouched. And yet the changes would be quite numerous enough to irritate the man of letters, the man of business, or the man in the street. I have no doubt that Professor Skeat would agree with me that Dr. Sweet's Romic system is theoretically preferable to a mode of spelling only partially reformed, but he would say that the adoption of such a system is not to be hoped for in the present century, that the better must not be the enemy of the good. Well, is there much better chance that Dr. Skeat's very moderate and sensible suggestions will be adopted? The history of the movement in the past is not calculated to make us very sanguine on this point. Augustus Hare, Julius Hare, Whewell, Thirlwall worked in the past, Dr. Furnival is still working, not by precept only but by example, towards the improvement of our spelling, but only one or two here and there have been induced to adopt their improved orthography. Still, I would say to philologists that what is needed is not so much exhortation on paper as the dynamic force of a good example. Nothing would further the cause of spelling reform more than the adoption of Professor Skeat's suggestions by the British Academy. Let Professor Skeat's "The Problem of Spelling Reform" be printed with Professor Skeat's spellings—that is, provided the compositors can be persuaded not to strike in protest against the innovation. Let the philologists begin. Let Professor Skeat show his faith by his works—including his Etymological Dictionary. Writers and practical men will never be influenced by theoretical suggestions alone, however good. What will influence them will be the practice and example of the best writers and the most eminent scholars. Usage—the usage of the best men in literature and philology—is the only criterion between what is good and bad, between what is allowable and what is not allowable in the written word. I am afraid that in consequence of the well-known conservatism of the printing-press, progress towards better spelling must be very slow; but it will be sure, if only scholars are faithful in pointing out defects, and if they are careful to practise what they preach. Professor Skeat, like Moses on a lonely mountain height, surveys the Promised Land from afar; I wonder when the Children of Light will find a Joshua whose valiant deeds would be the surest pledge of ultimate success.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

ELIE METCHNIKOFF

We are no other than a moving row
Of Magic Shadow-shapes that come and go Round with the Sun-illumin'd Lantern held
In midnight by the Master of the Show.

KNOWLEDGE for its own sake is a commodity that most of us have yet to learn is worth having: worth striving for: that it is more likely to bring about the regeneration of the world than any of the nostrums so far tried. And for the comfort of the "practically" minded it may be pointed out that in the future, no less than in the past, discoveries will arise therefrom that will lead to the amassing of great fortunes, and to increase of our creature comforts, as well as to the "merely interesting."

In support of this contention we might cite many instances; but none more striking than that afforded by the life of Elie Metchnikoff—happily still with us. Born in 1845 in a village of the Government of Kharkoff, he was educated at the Gymnasium and the University of Kharkoff. At nineteen years of age he began to take up his life's work—zoology; studying for six years under Leuckart, Henle, and von Siebold, names well known to zoologists. His period of probation over, he was then made Professor of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy at Odessa. Here he devoted himself to some of the most difficult work that biology offers—the tracing out of the embryological history of insects, echinoderms, worms and jelly-fish. This work, however, came to an end when, in 1882, he resigned the Professorship and became Director of the Municipal Bacteriological Laboratory, a change destined to have momentous results, for in 1888 the mantle of Pasteur fell upon him, and he was translated to the Pasteur Institute, Paris; where he still remains.

By the layman the place of bacteria in the scheme of Nature, and the part they play, more especially with regard to health and disease, are but dimly understood; and this is but natural, since a first-hand acquaintance therewith demands an extensive biological training and great technical skill. But for this work Metchnikoff was peculiarly suited, and has proved himself as great a master of his subject as Pasteur, whom he succeeded. In their achievements these two men, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say, stand unrivalled as benefactors of the human race. Pasteur, who, as Professor Ray Lankester remarks, before he took up the study of bacteria had attained distinction as a chemist:

Saved the silk-worm industry of France and Italy from destruction, taught the French wine makers to quickly mature their wine . . . effected an enormous improvement and economy in the manufacture of beer, . . . rescued the sheep and cattle of Europe from the fatal disease "anthrax," and it is probable . . . has rendered hydrophobia a thing of the past.

Metchnikoff, originally a zoologist pure and simple, has applied himself more especially to the relations of bacteria to man himself, earning thereby our profound gratitude, as well as lasting fame.

His work at the Pasteur Institute, however, though confined to microscopic forms of life, has not been wholly bacteriological. For it was here that he conducted his memorable researches on the natural history of inflammation, completely changing the views hitherto held on this most important subject. The memoir which he wrote on this theme was a remarkable one in many ways. For in the first place he demonstrated that pathology and biology, so far from being widely separated subjects, are, in reality, intimately connected: inasmuch as the symptoms of disease do but represent the results of the attacks of minute parasitic plants and animals on their host—man. Thus he put pathology before us, and before medical men especially, in an entirely new light. This choice of the study of the phenomena of inflammation as a means of proving his contention was a wise one, affording striking evidence in support of his thesis. Briefly, he showed that the heat, redness, and swelling, hitherto regarded as the essential factors of inflammation were really but secondary phenomena; that many diseases never before suspected to have any connection with inflammation were really inflammatory. That, in short, "inflammation" is the outward and visible sign of the inward battle of the organism with foreign matter—living or dead—introduced from without. This battle is carried on, in the higher animals, by means of hosts of microscopic bodies called "phagocytes" whose work is to police the system. Where the mischief is local, and superficial, as in the case of wounds, these phagocytes migrate to the seat of mischief to seize, and if possible devour, the invading matter, such as bacteria; while such as perish in the struggle are in turn devoured by phagocytes of another order: hence the exudation and swelling of inflammation, and its ultimate reduction.

This far-reaching discovery arose out of observations originally made on "water-fleas"! And more than this: for his researches on these phagocytes, many of which are always to be found in the blood of the higher animals, led to the discovery that it was to the agency of these bodies that the bleaching of the hair in old age is due! There is something almost weird about the transformation: something uncanny in the reflection that the silver hairs we venerate have acquired this honourable hue as the result of a species of internal digestion. But it is a fact that, at the stimulus of some subtle influence, certain minute particles of living matter within the centre of the hair become suddenly active, and devour all the pigment within their reach. Once filled with the coloured particles—which till now hid the glint from the hour-glass of Time—these cells become migratory, and, quitting the hair, either find their way under the skin or leave the body, bearing with them the cherished sign of vigour, which can never be replaced.

But it is through his latest book, the "Nature of Man," that Metchnikoff will probably be most widely known. It is a strangely fascinating book, yet one to be avoided by those who do not like to entertain Truth unadorned. Omar Khayyám, of blessed memory, described himself as one "who stitched the tents of Science," and we are led, almost, to regard Prof. Metchnikoff as Omar re-incarnate: returned purged of his old enthusiasm for the wine-bottle, and advocating in place thereof a severe course of abstinence, of plain living and high thinking. Like Omar, he will have it that:

I came like Water, and like Wind I go.

Yet in spite of this conviction he will not say: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," but rather regards this inevitable end as an event far off, and some day to be desired, as a tired child desires sleep. Death, he assures us, is only terrible because, save to one in a million, he comes too soon: before we have become tired of living; that, in short, when the fires of life burn low, the instinctive desire to live becomes replaced by a no less ardent desire to die.

In a series of most fascinating essays he unveils a picture of human frailties of a nature that few have ever suspected, as well as of many that we have regarded as inevitable, but which, it would seem, are not necessarily so.

Man, he holds, more than any other animal, is out of harmony with his environment. And this because his evolution into a "rational animal" has been unduly rapid. The refinements of civilisation have made demands on his animal frame too heavy to meet; and to this we may trace, if not all, at least most of "the ills that flesh is heir to." And not the least of these, it will surprise many and grieve not a few to learn, have arisen from what most of us insist on calling the "Consolations of Religion." These, he holds, are born of our dread of Death, which comes to us before we have really exhausted the capacity for life. We have eaten of the Tree of Knowledge prematurely; before our mental digestion was ripe for its assimilation; hence Religion is a form of mental indigestion. Similarly, in forswearing, or, on the other hand, misusing our natural animal appetites and customs we have shown ourselves out of harmony with our physical environment. Furthermore, on account of our artificial life we find ourselves burdened with organs no longer useful, while others, on the verge of disappearance, which in the natural course of events would have vanished without disturbing the system, are now a source of grave and hourly danger.

The almost imperceptible downy hairs which cover our bodies, for example, are all that remain of the hairy investment of our ape-like ancestors. No longer useful as a source of warmth, they have now become a real danger; the follicles, or little pits in the skin, from which they arise, form admirable lurking-places for microbes, giving rise to acne and pimples: and even chronic skin-diseases. Our "wisdom" teeth, no longer useful, are in process of suppression, appearing late in life and sometimes being delayed till extreme old age. These, too, are a source of danger. No other teeth, indeed, are so subject to accident, leading sometimes to grave diseases, and even to death. That little blind appendage to the intestine, the "Vermiform appendix," has earned, of late years, something like notoriety on account of the disease known as "appendicitis," to which it gives rise; and at the same time we have learned that it may be removed with impunity. But the fact that we could dispense with our stomachs and a few yards of our intestines will probably come as a surprise to the layman. The loss of the greater part of the large intestine, indeed, would, it seems, be extremely to our advantage, since it harbours swarms of poison-secreting microbes. The luxuriance of this bacterial flora may be gathered from the fact that recent research has shown that the bacteria of the human intestine increase at the rate of 128,000,000,000,000 each day, the greater part being found in the large intestine. No wonder, with such a poison factory within him, that man's life is prematurely shortened. Metchnikoff would remedy this by transforming the "wild population of the intestine into a cultured population." This he proposes to effect by appropriate serums, and a liberal use of sour milk, the lactic acid of which is inimical to the growth of putrefactive bacteria.

That gravest of problems to-day, the falling birth-rate, and the "Disharmonies of Reproduction" in general are thoughtfully and suggestively reviewed: some aspects of the question opening up, as he remarks, "a problem to which the attention of moralists and legislators alike may well be directed."

All Metchnikoff's work, of late years, has been devoted to the study, not so much of prolonging life, as of preserving life until it has run its natural course; which, it appears, is by no means bounded by the proverbial three-score years and ten: indeed, at this age man, the Professor holds, has but reached middle life, since normal death should not take place before one hundred and forty or thereabouts.

But this task is a formidable one. To achieve success it will not be sufficient to control the harmful bacterial flora of the body, or to remove vestiges of organs which endanger life: besides these alien hosts and these remnants of the past, man, late in life, becomes the victim of the natural products of his own body—the phagocytes. In the hey-day of life these bodies act as the police of the system: but with the slowing down of vitality they proceed to feed upon the tissues they have so jealously protected from foreign invasion. Verily, we are fearfully and wonderfully made. But Professor Metchnikoff, unappalled at the discovery he has made, is ready with a remedy: though he is careful to explain that it is but a possible remedy. The measures, then, which he would take to stay this work of revolution are drastic, since he would restore order by the administration of a species of witch's broth; an elixir obtained from the bodies of such of our fellow men as have fallen by the way. This rejuvenating potion is to be obtained by injecting, say, a horse, with "finely minced atoms of human organs, such as brain, heart, liver, kidney, etc." Thereby he would obtain serums which could be drawn off and introduced into the body of the failing one, the nature of the injection being determined by the organ to be renovated.

Sinister as this proposal seems at first sight, it will appear less so, if, setting prejudice aside, we endeavour to measure the gain to humanity that such a treatment might ensure.

Old age [says Metchnikoff] is repulsive at present, because it is an old age devoid of its true meaning, full of egoism, narrowness of view, and malignancy. The physiological old age of the future assuredly will be very different . . . at present practically a useless burden on the community, [it] will become a period of work valuable to the community. As the old man will no longer be subject to loss of memory or to intellectual weakness, he will be able to apply his great experience to the most complicated and the most delicate parts of the social life.

But, though death may be bidden to wait awhile, he cannot be evaded. Will he, Metchnikoff asks, ever be welcomed? It is not enough for him that:

... When that Angel of the darker Drink
At last shall find you by the river-brink,
And, offering his Cup, invite your Soul
Forth to your Lips to quaff—you shall not shrink.

He expresses a hope that, so far from shrinking, the drink shall be eagerly quaffed. And this hope is based on the belief that, latent and long-forgotten, locked within his breast, man holds at least a vestige of a once active desire for death: an instinct that comes to all when the normal course of life has run. Has not the enormous period during which it has remained latent led to atrophy? he asks. And to this question he replies: "The Science of the future alone can answer." Among the old Jewish patriarchs, it must not be forgotten, there appears to have been some such instinct, and these men, as Metchnikoff points out, lived far beyond what we now regard as the normal span of life.

It would be idle to expect that the Gospel of Life according to Metchnikoff will be regarded among the majority of men of to-day as anything better than a Gospel of Despair: too appalling to contemplate. Rather, they will say with St. Paul: "If only in this life we have hope, we are of all men most miserable." Be that as it may, and let Professor Metchnikoff's views on this great question be what they will, there can be no doubt but that, among the scientific men of to-day, he holds one of the foremost places. He will even stand as a reproach to those who insist that the study of the lower animals may be all very well for those who have nothing particular to do, but that it is by no means a pursuit to be encouraged, either by the State, or by teaching Institutions, State-aided or otherwise.

When Pope insisted that "the proper study of mankind is man" he probably had no idea of where this study might lead him. But Metchnikoff took him in deadly earnest; and in the true scientific spirit began his work by studying man as an animal—to the lasting benefit of his race. For the most part, however, his labours can be appreciated only by the expert—the biologist, and those in the honoured profession of medicine. And among these his name will ever be revered as that of a man of high ideals, and great scientific attainments. Probably those best able to appreciate his work will feel that he may most justly be described as a genius. It is however by this, his latest book, that Elie Metchnikoff will best be known to those who are not biologists. Herein they will gather an insight into human nature and the problems of Life and Death, such as will be found nowhere else. And if he had done no more than this, he would have secured for himself the grateful thanks of us all.

FICTION

The Saint. By ANTONIO FOGAZZARO. Translated from the Italian by M. PRICHARD-AGNETTI. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

Le Saint. Par ANTONIO FOGAZZARO. Traduit de l'Italien par G. HÉRELLE. (Hachette, 3fr. 50.)

"I ASK you and other prudent persons like you, where is your faith? Would you hesitate to serve Christ from fear of Peter?" The question put by the enthusiastic Liberal Catholic Professor, Andrea Minucci, to the Abbé Marinier, the worldly ecclesiastic with a career, strikes the keynote of this novel, which has had the distinction (rare for a novel) of being put on the Index. But it is not in the least a disguised tract or treatise, not even a novel "with a purpose" in the opprobrious sense of that phrase. Conclusions, morals perhaps, may be drawn from it, but only as one draws them from real life, naturally and inevitably. The life that it describes is passed in an environment very unfamiliar to most Englishmen, and therefore all the more interesting since the author knows it intimately from the inside.

The story is a simple one. Piero Maironi, a young Brescian, is summoned from an intrigue with a married woman, Jeanne Dessalle, to the deathbed of his wife, who has been for some time in a lunatic asylum but recovers her reason just before her death. In the little church adjoining the asylum Maironi has a vision which alters the whole course of his life. He leaves the world and adopts the name of Benedetto, but remains a layman and joins no religious Order. Driven from the monastery in the precincts of which he has taken refuge, he goes forth to preach to the people and is hailed by the peasants as a saint and miracle-worker. He disclaims miraculous power; and a sick man, who is brought to him to be healed, dies under his roof, repentant through his influence but without the last Sacraments, which are brought too late. Naturally, Benedetto is discarded by his ignorant followers, only one of whom, the village schoolmistress, remains faithful, and he goes to Rome, where he becomes the leader of a movement for the reform of the Church. Naturally, again, he comes into conflict with ecclesiastical authority, and, although he has an audience of the Pope, who is benevolent but helpless, he is relentlessly pursued by Vatican intrigue. The Sanhedrim hands him over to Pontius Pilate; in other words, a bargain is struck between the Vatican and the Italian Government: the Vatican agrees to withdraw an episcopal nomination that is distasteful to the Government if the latter will get the troublesome Maironi out of Rome. Ministerial pressure is put on a friendly senator who has given Benedetto shelter: the latter is practically turned into the streets, but is taken in by an agnostic professor, Mayda, in whose house he dies, apparently a failure, but foretelling with undying faith the triumph of his cause in the person of his disciples.

Benedetto is a twentieth-century St. Francis—not the literal Francis of history, but such as he might have been in the different circumstances and environment of the twentieth century. The author sets him down in modern Italy and the modern Roman Church, and shows what would inevitably happen to him—or perhaps even to a greater than St. Francis, for that is undoubtedly hinted at. The "Scribes and Pharisees" of twentieth-century Rome, as the author paints them, bear a striking resemblance to their prototypes of the first century in Palestine, and it is impossible not to feel that, in the same circumstances, they would probably act in the same way. This being so, it is, perhaps, hardly surprising that the book is on the Index.

Apart from its special interest as a study of Italian religious life, "The Saint" is a novel worthy of its author's great reputation. There are elements, no doubt, in the character of Benedetto which will not appeal strongly to the average Englishman, but even he must admit that the character is wonderfully convincing. The author does not tell us about Benedetto's influence; he makes us realise and understand it. The least mystical of readers will scarcely resist the charm of this remarkable figure, ascetic yet human, profoundly mystical yet zealous for practical reform and not at all self-centred. Benedetto's claim to be considered a saint has been hotly contested in certain theological circles, and, in truth, he is not of the type that modern Rome raises as a rule to her altars. He belongs to the family of the great saints, canonised and uncanonised, those who, like Origen, Theodoret, Francis of Assisi, or Thomas More (to mention very different examples) have been, in M. Joly's words, "the greatest heresiarchs, that is to say, the boldest innovators, the most eager searchers after truth." Probably only a Catholic could have created such a character, but Benedetto, like his prototypes, will belong to the world at large, for he will certainly take his place among the great characters of fiction.

The author has been no less successful with Jeanne Dessalle. When the book opens, her lover has already fled from the world; her husband and Maironi's wife are dead so that there is no obstacle to their legal union, and her whole energies are bent on finding her lover and winning him back. When she does find him, it is not Piero Maironi that she finds but a new man. The process by which her passion becomes purified and spiritualised and she gradually finds that faith is quite natural and entirely consistent with her character. The other characters of the book are representative of many types, religious and irreligious, sincere and insincere; it is a gallery of modern Italian portraits. With even the least important the author has taken pains; they are no mere types, but living men and women. Nowhere is the author's creative power more conspicuous than in the description of the Liberal Catholic meeting in the house of Giovanni Selva, the Biblical critic and intellectual reformer. The different characters of the ecclesiastics and laymen present are sketched with the pencil of a master, and some of them might without difficulty be identified. The most dramatic scene in the book—perhaps it is a little melodramatic—is the private audience in which Benedetto denounces to the Pope the four "spirits of evil" in the Church. In vain the author gives the Pope a "thin, waxen face"; his identity cannot be mistaken. Profoundly pious and entirely well-meaning, feeling that something is wrong but ignorant what it is, overpowered by a position for which he knows himself to be incapable and helpless in a nest of intrigue, he is a pathetic figure. Benedetto's interview with the Minister of the Interior is perhaps more convincing: "My friend is not Herod and I am not Pilate," says the Minister; but we know better.

The English version reads fairly well as a piece of English, but as a translation it is not satisfactory and the author's meaning is often inadequately represented or even distorted. But it will give the English reader a very fair idea of the book as a whole, and he will miss nothing essential. As for the French translation, it is a brilliant piece of work which, but for the title-page, one would not recognise as a translation at all; those who read it will scarcely be at a disadvantage as compared with readers of the original Italian.

Frere's Housekeeper. By MARGARET SMITH. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

THAT men and women are made up of mingled good and evil, that no one is all white or black, is a truth that we recognise in practice and too often forget in our fiction. Therefore, when we found the Squire in Miss Margaret Smith's very clever and well-written book behaving at first like a cad and trying to make illicit love to "Frere's housekeeper," we concluded that he was going to behave like a cad all through—going, in fact, to be a "villain." It is true that there was what average morality might consider some excuse for him: the girl was acting as unpaid housekeeper to a young widower; her position was compromising, and a "man of the world" might, with the characteristic ignorance which the title implies, take her for the kind of woman to accept his advances. But the general reader is so little used to finding in novels the mingled black and white of human nature, that, in spite of the extenuating circumstances, he may be surprised to find out that Pearce Hardy is not, after all, the "villain," and turns out in the end an honest fellow. There is no villain, indeed, in the story. All the characters are mingled black and white, and Miss Smith knows how to make them live under our eyes. We end, after an interesting and sometimes exciting story, with wedding-bells. The Squire marries the housekeeper, the woman of inferior and even disgraceful family connection; and we leave them to a life that may be happy, may be unhappy, will probably be, like that of most married couples, of mingled black and white, but will certainly not be, like that of many married couples, of a uniform dull grey. We shall look out for Miss Smith's next book. An author who can so delineate character is worth watching.

Phoebe of the White Farm. By MAY CROMMELIN. (Long, 6s.)

NOTHING could be more innocent and rural than the peaceful domestic scene which introduces "Phoebe of the White Farm." A kind-hearted couple with a devoted and dutiful niece, basking in the beneficent care of Phoebe's rich god-mother, are not the materials out of which tragedies are usually made. Even the shocking end of the uncle and aunt, who are overturned into a pond and drowned, does not lead us to expect anything more stirring than a pleasant country idyll. The stalwart young hero has just arrived from Canada; the breathless Phoebe is already listening, open-mouthed, to his tales of travel, thereby sowing seeds of jealousy in the heart of her cousin, Edgar, and we seem well on our way through a pretty love-tale, with nothing more exciting in view than the usual lovers' quarrels. Then Phoebe goes to France as confidential maid to her god-mother, Miss Cunningham, a volatile maiden lady; and we discover that this apparently peaceful romance is sensational to the last degree. The appearance of Phoebe's long-lost father, erstwhile burglar and convict, is the signal for this sudden change. Cunning, cruel and unscrupulous, he pursues his daughter round the Continent, intent upon the family pearls of her mistress. It is only by an intelligence and audacity doubtless inherited from her criminal parent that Phoebe is enabled to outwit him and his confederates, and save the jewels. Many and ingenious are his attempts to attain his nefarious end, and the last bold coup, which costs him his life, is very nearly successful. All ends well, however; Phoebe, rid of her unpleasant parent, marries the stalwart hero, whose adventuress wife has been opportunely burnt up in a cellar. Even Miss Cunningham is provided for, and bestows her hand and her pearls on a jovial Irish widower. Miss Crommelin is to be congratulated on her portrayal of Charles Grainger, the ex-convict, and her story is both ingenious and amusing.

FINE ART

THE GENIUS OF REMBRANDT

THE pendulum of critical opinion as the years go by swings in a shorter crescent. In viewing the old masters we no longer sweep from one extreme to the other, alternating between a state of ecstatic praise and one of entire indifference: the inevitable ebb and flow of our thoughts constantly tends towards an equilibrium. Nevertheless, the ideal state of perfect balance, that millennium in which the artist and the archivist can lie down together is still far away, and we must not, on the whole, regret its remoteness. Not only would such a condition of complete equanimity deprive those of us who write on art of most of our material, but art itself might languish from lack of the stimulus provided by discussion.

To-day, while we celebrate the tercentenary of Rembrandt's birth, we may, perhaps, flatter ourselves that we are wiser than our sires and no longer regard him as a man who could not draw and who treated lofty subjects in a base and degraded style. That was the fashion fifty years ago, but there cannot now be any reasonable doubt that in regarding Rembrandt as one of the greatest and most profound artists in any medium whom the world has ever produced we are much nearer the truth. Possibly some future generation will find that even our soundest critics have gone a little too far in the direction of panegyric, may hold that we have given too many marks to character and insight and too few to outward beauty and attractiveness. Such considerations, however, need not trouble us seriously. We cannot anticipate the verdict of posterity, even though we may sometimes widen our horizon by thinking about it.

Yet, if the relative place of Rembrandt's genius is thus more or less a matter of certainty, its true nature appears to be an open question still. During the last few months two books have been published in Germany by the same firm and in the same series, the one dealing with Rembrandt's painting and the other (and the more recent) with his etchings. Now, these two books take views of Rembrandt so diametrically opposed to each other that the student of his work who turns to them may well be puzzled; the more so because each book represents the opinion of a recognised group of authorities.

The first of the two, which deals with Rembrandt's paintings, is based upon the researches of Dr. Bode. In it, we find almost all the paintings attributed by Dr. Bode to Rembrandt arranged in chronological order, from the year 1627, when Rembrandt started an independent career as an artist at the age of twenty-one, to the year 1669, in which he died, a forgotten pauper. This long series of nearly 600 pictures includes a mass of work so various that a great portion of it for years passed unrecognised except as the work of Rembrandt's scholars or assistants. We find a large proportion of the paintings ascribed to the first ten years of his career which are tentative or experimental—paintings which are sometimes clumsy in technique, sometimes distinctly weak in drawing, while many are awkward in arrangement or unpleasant in colour. In the paintings ascribed to Rembrandt's old age we meet with similar inequalities. Only in middle life does the master seem to have worked, I will not say faultlessly but, with a certain even sureness of accomplishment, which makes it easy to recognise his hand in all that it touches.

In fact, in this book on Rembrandt's painting we see him passing through the same stages of development which are noticeable in more commonplace men. In youth he has to teach himself to break away from the stilted conventional tradition in which he was trained, and by dint of constant experiment in many styles to create a style of his own exactly suited to the thoughts he felt compelled to express. Those thoughts in themselves were such as no other artist before him had conceived; there was, thus, no forerunner to point the way, so through constant effort and trial of new devices of lighting, handling and design, he was compelled to work out his salvation for himself.

The book on Rembrandt's etchings approaches the master from an entirely different standpoint. Its learned author evidently holds strongly to the opinion that Rembrandt's natural gifts were infallible, but that he had many pupils, and that to them must be attributed every work bearing his signature that has any faults of design or execution. Although the chief critics of Rembrandt's etchings have differed on minor points, those who have hitherto carried the most weight have agreed in attributing to him some three hundred plates. That number, in this new book on the subject, is reduced to nearly one half by the omission of every plate which bears the least trace of haste, inexperience or excessive elaboration, with the result that Rembrandt is presented as an artist almost impeccable, whose genius was sufficient to overleap in an instant all the limitations and conventions of the feeble tradition in which he was trained, and in the course of a long life to do no single etching which was unworthy of his noblest moments.

That these two conceptions of Rembrandt are mutually destructive will be clear at a glance. The etcher who produced less than two hundred plates of evenly sustained merit is an entirely different personality from the painter who produced during the same period nearly six hundred pictures of most unequal merit. If we accept the one Rembrandt, we must, to be logical, deny the other.

The general tendency of modern criticism undoubtedly favours Dr. Singer's theory to a considerable extent, and it has previously been expounded in other forms by Sir Francis Seymour Haden and Professor Legros. Leonardo, Michelangelo, Giorgione and Titian have also recently undergone the same treatment. The works which tradition had attributed to them have been sifted and whittled down until the best modern criticism accepts without reserve only those pictures in which their genius shines undimmed, giving to assistants, friend or pupils everything which does not attain to a like supreme standard of perfection. So far, indeed, has the process gone that signs of reaction are setting in, and men are beginning to ask whether it is invariably safe to suppose that pupils whose extant signed works are uniformly indifferent could on occasion attain to a degree of success so complete that their contemporaries, and the connoisseurs of two or three succeeding centuries, failed to distinguish them from that of the mighty master with whom they were associated.

This difference of critical opinion as to the nature and essence of genius is neither absurd nor unnatural, since it springs from two very natural tendencies of the human mind. The first of these tendencies regards the man of genius as something so far removed from our common humanity as to be no longer subject to the laws which govern ordinary mortals, as to be one born without the taint of fallibility which makes human work imperfect, whose progress from infancy to old age is marked by a series of masterpieces in which there can be no place for experiment or failure. That is the popular view; and the opinion that the man of genius is a man of the same clay as ourselves, subject to the same infirmities and rising above them only by the possession of superior intellect and more profound insight, is too vulgar and commonplace to attract the vote of the majority. Nevertheless, in England, at least, we are bound to take it seriously, for it was held and clearly enunciated by the great head and founder of our English school, Sir Joshua Reynolds. The Discourses of Reynolds are one long statement of the speaker's profound conviction that the degree of intellect which we term genius differs from lesser degrees of intellect mainly in virtue of its quality and intensity; that the mind of a man of genius develops just as the mind of a man of talent, though far more rapidly, and that it works on principles no less really definite, if infinitely more difficult to express, than those which guide able men in other walks of life.

If we consider Rembrandt's genius in the light of Reynolds's theory, it is impossible not to see that many of our difficulties in the way of appreciating him are at once removed. In the long series of paintings attributed to him by Dr. Bode, we recognise at once a gradual and natural process of development. Here and there we may omit some particular picture as entirely unworthy of Rembrandt, but on the whole we cannot help confessing that the mental image we form from the series is a consistent one. Rembrandt in youth appears to make just the mistakes and experiments that we expect a clever young man to make. When he grows old, failing sight and failing health once more impair his powers, just as they have impaired the powers of the other great artists who have reached old age.

Dr. Singer's theory, on the other hand, has to deny that Rembrandt had a share in nearly all the etchings which date from his youth, and in many of those which belong to his old age. He thus rejects alike almost all the early portraits and sketches, and later marvels such as the Ephraim Bonus and the large Coppenol! If Dr. Singer be correct, Dr. Bode must likewise eliminate quite half of the paintings he has included in his series. Yet when the process of reduction is carried thus far, we feel inclined to ask: "If Rembrandt did not execute the greater portion of the paintings and etchings attributed to him, who did?"

Now, we know enough about the work of every pupil and follower that Rembrandt ever had to say that this question is unanswerable. Lievens, Van Vliet, Dou, Bol, the de Konings, Fabritius, Aart de Gelder and others have all left us specimens of their work, by which we can judge their capacity, and by the help of which we may occasionally think we see reasons for presuming their assistance in some particular work attributed to Rembrandt. Such instances, however, are few; and until the destructive critics can construct some more efficient alumni than these we may quite safely assume that the traditional view of Rembrandt's work is correct, and that the bulk of the etching and painting that bears his signature is substantially from his hand.

Do we lose much by taking this view? Surely we lose nothing? In some respects, indeed, we are the gainers, since we can regard the profound and majestic genius of Rembrandt as a thing not wholly alien from us; as an intellect which, however great it was potentially at the outset, developed slowly through persistent study, self-criticism and continual experiment, until it reached its superb meridian; to decline at the last, as all human effort must in some degree decline, when old age lays heavy hands upon it. No more inspiring and splendid example could be set before young ambition.

MUSIC

A CRITIC'S BOOK

"MUSIC AND MUSICIANS" is a comprehensive title, which leaves the author free to roam where his fancy takes him, or rather, since the book with this title is a compilation, leaves him free to include any or all of the thoughts about music, which the musical life of London of the past twelve years has suggested to him, and which have appeared in various papers at the appropriate moments. In a short preface to his book Mr. E. A. Baughan says:

I have been brought face to face with some revelations of mental development which I had not expected. At first a chronological arrangement seemed to be the proper plan, but on consideration I felt that the public would not be as interested in the development of my critical sense as I myself have been, and a certain chaos would have resulted.

This sentence seems to be the key to the whole book; it suggests what is its charm, its strength and its weakness, its interest and the reason why it occasionally palls. It also leads to the reflection that the title, for all its apparent largeness, does not really fit the book, for, whatever may have been the case when these papers first appeared and were read by a public fresh from the experiences of which they treat, it is certainly not so much the music and musicians discussed as Mr. Baughan himself and his development as a critic which are of interest to the reader, who now sits down to study these essays, not disjointedly in a daily or weekly paper, but consecutively in one neatly got up volume. So I, for one, think that the author miscalculated in making the assumption quoted from the preface, and this breaking up of the chronological order has just spoiled, by making less clear, the chief interest of the book. Still, I am rather glad he made the mistake, because it is of a piece with the perfect modesty of his tone throughout. Any one who reads the musical criticism of the Daily News, knows that the articles signed E. A. B. therein are given as a purely personal expression of opinion, and without the almighty "we" which lends importance to the utterance of most "dailies." So these essays, many of which have made a first appearance in the Daily News, or some other periodical, are a frank expression of fresh musical impressions, unpremeditated and therefore not very judicious—often, indeed, rather self-contradictory, since they are affected strongly by the mood of the author at the moment—but valuable, as honesty and simplicity always must be.

The first part, under the collective heading "Random Reflections," is to my mind by far the most interesting. To quote the titles from the list of contents would show that there is very little about music, meaning thereby certain specified compositions, still less about musicians, but a great deal about how different types of music, either of composition or performance, affect the author. To get the greatest amount of pleasure from this, it must be read as autobiography, and to this we should certainly have been helped if the author had let us know when we are reading what he thought twelve years ago, and when what he thinks now. Not knowing that, I can only point to a few papers which seem to me most suggestive. In the first place, those dealing with that troublesome creature, "the critic," are full of ideas. Mr. Baughan, unlike most critics, stands up for his own kind. True, he does not think very much of any one living specimen, but he believes in the function of the critic, as Matthew Arnold did, as a creative one, and he looks forward with a child-like optimism to the arrival of the perfect critic.

I want to see a man come forward who shall have the authority of a Davidson or a Chorley, but with a much wider grasp of musical æsthetics than these. He should have deep musical knowledge both practical and theoretical, and, in addition to this knowledge, he should possess a sensitive and poetic temperament balanced by keen judgment, and, above all, a fine, nervous, plastic style of writing.

This is splendid; certainly there never was greater need for such a guiding hand than at the present time, nor a wider field open to the man who is strong enough to take it.

Mr. Baughan's own development as a critic, though, is more clearly to be traced in such papers as "The Symphonic poem—an interview with Wagner," a decidedly original way of conveying his opinions; "The Obvious in Music"; "Some Reactions"; "The Art of Restraint"; "Poisonous Appreciations"; "The Hooligan in Music," and some others, all with characteristic titles. I do not know exactly from where Mr. Baughan started, but I take it that he must have been fed and nourished on Der Ring des Nibelungen and, indeed, all the modern pre-Straussian types of music, and have started out on his critical career with the firm conviction that to defend Wagner and Tschaikovsky against all comers was the duty of the true knight of the forward school of musical criticism. Then he evidently began to think, and from his "random reflections" come such remarks as these:

I shall not care if twelve months elapse before I hear Tschaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony again. . . . Its gloom no longer seems to me the gloom of a mind noble, but of a mind sick.

There is much in the Wagner music-dramas which seems to me false as art, however "effective" it may be as music. It is an emotional Turkish bath; a plaster to arouse emotion nearly dead from inanition.

It is hardly fair to make these quotations, because they are only small excerpts from a really large point of view. It is evident, though, from their appearance, following upon the blind idolatry of Wagner, which is as much the creed of our school as the idolatry of Beethoven is of another school of critics, that the writer has found that beyond what he appreciates in these heroes music has other possibilities, which they do not fulfil. His anti-Wagnerian tendencies go on getting stronger and stronger, and eventually find full expression in some papers devoted to the subject. But—and this is the best point about Mr. Baughan's work—his enthusiasm never cools, his admiration for Wagner remains as strong as, perhaps stronger than, when he was a whole-hearted Wagnerian; only he has found out that Wagner and Tschaikovsky and others no longer need the support of his lance, that, indeed, the art needs some defence against their influence. So he tilts hard against the unreality and exaggerated emotion of Tristan, the "Hooliganism" of the 1812 overture, all the time clearing and widening his own point of view, sometimes at the expense of his reader, who is apt to expect a critic to have settled all his opinions before he begins to write, not to go on developing them as he writes. But what Mr. Baughan is really striving for is to be rid of the absurdities and conventions which still cling round our art. It is what his hero, Wagner, strove for, though in the end he succeeded in implanting a fresh crop of them upon the field of the art in which he worked. Of course, Mr. Baughan has found a new hero, and, of course, that hero is the composer of Ein Heldenleben. To the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss he has devoted the last part of his book, the part which I must confess to finding least interesting, because least individual. His essays on this subject are a blend of hero-worship and criticism which leaves a vague impression of temporising. We, the public, have not yet reached such a position with regard to Strauss that we can be much helped by this sort of thing; we are more helped by comparing the bigoted, one-sided views of each party, than by a point of view which is evidently almost as much in the making as our own. For instance, it is rather staggering after reading through several essays of description and some eulogy to come upon this sentence:

With regard to Strauss, I have not yet heard anything of his which seems to be the utterance of a great genius; because, up to that moment, I—and I suspect others with me—was under the impression that Mr. Baughan saw in Strauss the genius of the future, whatever faults he might see in his individual works. Here, I think, Mr. Baughan has overstepped the limits of the freedom which a critic can allow himself. However much we may respect the open mind, the power to revise opinion and retract in favour of a more mature judgment, it becomes an evil when it results in the hasty expression of an unformed opinion, which is readily withdrawn for the sake of another not much more mature. Perhaps fuller revision might have saved the book from inconsistency and so improved it. Mr. Baughan is not in himself inconsistent—at least, not more so than any honest human being who allows himself to think—but perhaps he should compel his thoughts to form conclusions rather more definitely before committing them to paper, or at any rate before transferring them from the momentary publicity of the Press to the permanency which they now occupy. None the less for this, however, “Music and Musicians” is a valuable contribution to present-day thought on music, and a book which has the rare merit that in it the reader learns to know the author.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

“THE Canadian War of 1812,” by Mr. C. P. Lucas, will be issued immediately by the Oxford University Press. The book has been compiled as far as possible from the despatches on both sides relating to the war. Six out of the eight maps which accompany the letterpress are contemporary American maps reproduced from a little volume in the Colonial Office Library.

Mr. Augustine Birrell is to edit the volume of Browning's poems in Messrs. Jack's forthcoming “Golden Poets.” The volumes, of which six will appear during the present year, will present several interesting features, such, for instance, as the inclusion of a series of dainty coloured plates. Among other editors are: Mr. W. B. Yeats (Spenser), Mr. A. C. Benson (Whittier), Professor Dowden (Coleridge), Professor Saintsbury (Longfellow), Professor MacNeile Dixon (Wordsworth), Canon Beeching (Herrick), Mr. Charles Whibley (Byron), Mr. Arthur Symonds (Keats), Professor J. Churton Collins (Shelley).

Mr. John Lane will publish Sienkiewicz's novel, “The Field of Glory”—an historical romance dealing with Poland's struggle for independence—on Tuesday, July 17.

Messrs. Chatto and Windus will before long publish a volume in their St. Martin's Library containing R. L.

Stevenson's complete poems: “Ballads,” “Underwoods,” and “Songs of Travel.” The exclusion of his “Child's Garden of Verses” will, however, be regretted. A booklet similar to Stevenson's Prayers, containing his “Christmas Prayers” is also being prepared by the same publishers.

A travel book entitled “Vacation Days in Hawaii and Japan” will be published by Mr. Unwin on July 16. The author is Mr. Charles M. Taylor. Among the places described in the volume are: Honolulu, the volcano of Kilauea, Yokohama, Tokyo, and the Temples of Nikko, Kyoto, Kobe and Osaka, and there are also accounts of journeys in the country districts of Japan, with descriptions of scenery and local customs.—Mr. Unwin has also in the press a book on “The Nature and Purpose of the Universe,” by John Denham Parsons.

Another volume, commemorative of the George Buchanan quater-centenary celebrations, is to be published by the University Press, St. Andrews, next month. Several professors of Scotch and French Universities are contributing to the volume, which will be entitled “George Buchanan: a Memorial, 1506-1906”; it will contain appreciative papers on the various aspects of the great humanist's life and work, as well as translations of his verse by students of St. Andrews, Paris and Bordeaux; and it is passing through the press under the supervision of Mr. Millar, editor of the St. Andrews University Magazine.

Mr. Francis Griffiths has almost ready a little book entitled “Electioneering Up-to-Date,” with Suggestions for Amending the Corrupt Practices Act, by Charles Roden Buxton and J. C. Haig. Mr. Haig has contributed the chapters dealing with the Case of Thanet, and Mr. Buxton is responsible for the section on the bribery and corruption which invariably attend a general election.

Mr. Werner Laurie will publish shortly Pierre Loti's “India,” translated by Mr. George A. F. Inman and edited by Robert Harborough Sherard. Loti's idea in going to India was to discover whether in the Buddhist faith he could find anything to replace the Catholic religion in which he could no longer believe. The book traces his journeying through India till, finally, he visits the high priests of Theosophy who have sought refuge in India away from the tumult of life, and finds what his soul craves for.

The works of Mr. Herbert Strang, undoubtedly the best modern writer for boys, will in future be published by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton, who have three new books from his pen in the press: “One of Clive's Heroes: a Story of the Fight for India”; “Samba: a Story of the Rubber Slaves of the Congo Free State”; and “Jack Harvey: or a Hundred Years Ago.”

Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner and Co., have arranged to publish in volume form Father Bernard Vaughan's series of sermons on the “Sins of Society,” which he is now preaching in Mayfair, with a preface and appendix. The work will be issued in the autumn.

It has been rumoured that Professor Knight's memorial volume of Thomas Davidson is not likely to appear. We are able to state on the best authority, that the monograph on the Wandering Scholar, on which Dr. Knight has spent much time and spared no pains, will be published in the autumn.

CORRESPONDENCE

AUSTRALIAN RELIGION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I correct an inadvertent misrepresentation of Mr. Howitt, in my “Secret of the Totem” (pp. 197-200) and elsewhere? In his page 500 (“Native Tribes of South-East Australia”) I understood Mr. Howitt to say that the belief in an “All Father” does not occur in South-Eastern tribes which have not made “the advance from descent in the female to that in the male line.” I added that the statement was in collision with facts vouched for by Mr. Howitt himself. But he explains, in a paper in Folk Lore (June 1906), that his meaning was not what I understood it to be, and, consequently, there is no inconsistency in his statements. I am sorry that I misapprehended his meaning, and of course, withdraw my criticism, both as regards Mr. Howitt and Mr. Fraser, as far as he is involved in it.

ART FOR ART'S SAKE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—All things are a question of proportion. What is of undoubted importance from one point of view may from a central standpoint appear lop-sided and disproportionate. My objection to the cry of Art for Art's sake is that in its ordinary meaning it implies the glorification of technique for the sake of technique, of the symbol for the sake of the symbol, which inevitably ends in virtuosity and hieroglyphics. Art, like poetry, is one of the media through which life expresses itself. To proclaim Art for Art's sake as the last word on Art is to cut Art off from its source of inspiration. In Mr. Rutter's own words it "is a half-truth, and it is one of those half-truths which do infinite harm to the cause the poet (and I would add the artist) has at heart." I quite agree with him that "If a thing is worth doing, it is worth doing well." But the whole matter depends on whether it is worth doing. And only a reference to life can answer that question. Fronto wrote a very clever panegyric on dust. I question its value not because of the quality of his art, but because I doubt whether it was worth doing.

Mr. Rutter seems to misunderstand my position because he thinks I consider that Art should be mixed with morality. Morality is far too narrow a word. In its broadest sense it means what is considered good form at the time. All I require of Art and Poetry is that they should be criticisms and interpretations of life—which is something infinitely wider. Hence my plea for the recognition of the oneness of things which the Greeks so wonderfully realised, and which we, who live to-day in half a dozen different water-tight compartments, have such a difficulty in even apprehending. My article was really a protest not against a literary or artistic class, but against a literary or artistic caste which such shibboleths as Art for Art's sake inevitably tend to produce. My plea was for the carrière ouverte au Talents, for the free admission to the guild of all who show originality, who have some new interpretation or reading of life to bring forward, whether in verse or in paint—in a word a protest against those who think there is any finality in the art of expression or that every page in the great book of life has now been reproduced with an exactness which might be called photographic. This is what the Romantic school in the early part of the nineteenth century successfully fought against. I am the last person in the world to despise the old bottles and the old vintages, but I none the less think there is—and ever will be—a necessity for new wine and new bottles. To construct bottles without reference to the wine is to manufacture mere toys. The vessel derives its ultimate meaning from the purpose for which it was fashioned.

"LORD ARTHUR SAVILE'S CRIME"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was interested in the letter from a Mr. Cooke, which, under the above heading, you publish in this week's ACADEMY. The possibility had never occurred to me that any friend of Mr. Wilde's having come into possession of a relic so precious as the book referred to, would sell it. Hence my error.

I have communicated the letter to the two gentlemen who are translating my book into German and French, and in the new edition of my biography I will make the necessary correction.

CARACTACUS IN ENGLISH DRAMA

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Bonduca and Caractacus, as actual persons, might have their interest limited for us, as you say, to the lines you quote from an old Memoria technica and to the monument to the former on the Thames Embankment; but fortunately for our splendid literature the latter has been made by Beaumont and Fletcher the very type of what a truly brave soldier ought to be. It were well if the editors of our Jingo papers and all our braggadocio Imperialists would make it a rule to read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest their Tragedy of Bonduca; in every scene of which, in which he appears, from the first act wherein he calls his cousin Bonduca to account for empty boasting of her victory over the Romans, to the very end of the play which is finished by Suetonius, "General to the Roman Army in Britain," saying,

"March on, and thro' the camp, in every tongue,

The virtues of great Caratach be sung," in every scene, I say, "Caratach" appears the "very parfit gentil knight." I enclose a few quotations from they play. Perhaps if you can make room for them you will.

JAMES J. RAMSEY.

ACT I. SCENE I.

BOADICEA. The hardy Romans? Oh, ye gods of Britain,
The rust of arms, the blushing shame of soldiers!

Are these the men that conquer by inheritance?
The fortune-makers? these the Julians,

Enter CARATACH.

That with the sun measure the end of nature,
Making the world but our Rome, and our Cæsar?

Twice we have beat 'em, Nennius, scattered 'em,
Made themes for songs to shame 'em: And a woman,
A woman beat 'em, Nennius; a weak woman,
A woman beat these Romans!

CAR. So it seems;
A man would shame to talk so.

BOND. Who's that?

CAR. I.

BOND. Cousin! d'you grieve my fortunes?

CAR. No, Bonduca;

If I grieve, 'tis the bearing of your fortunes;
You put too much wind to your sail; discretion

And hardy valour are the twins of honour,

And, nurs'd together make a conqueror;

Divided but a talker. 'Tis a truth

That Rome has fled before us twice and routed;

A truth we ought to crown the gods for, lady,

And not our tongues; a truth is none of ours,

Nor in our ends more than the noble bearing;

For then it leaves to be a virtue, lady.

And we that have been victors, beat ourselves,

When we insult upon our honour's subject.

(Caratach, referring to the folly of triumphing over a soi-disant despicable enemy, proceeds):

"Where is your conquest then?

Why are your altars crowned with wreaths of flowers?

Why are these triumphs, lady? For a may-game?

For hunting a poor herd of wretched Romans?

Is it no more? Shut up your temples, Britons,

Let's home and sleep; for such great overthrow,

A candle burns too bright a sacrifice,

A glow-worm's tail too full of flame."

(The whole of this scene ought to be quoted, but one may hope you'll be the means, by admitting these few extracts, of sending a good many readers to the play; as good as any, I beg to say I think it, on account of the character of Caratach, in all our dramatic literature. These quotations give the key-note to Caratach's character which is finely sustained throughout.)

ISAIAH vii. 14

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Having read the article on "The Old Testament in Greek" in your last issue [June 30], and having particularly noticed your Reviewer's remarks on the above text, may I be allowed to make a few suggestions.

First that the text cannot be intended as a prediction of the birth of Christ. The whole sense of the chapter is adverse to this. Ahaz King of Judah is in great trouble and consternation on account of the confederacy which Pekah King of Israel and Rezin King of Syria had formed to besiege and subjugate Jerusalem. A sign is given to Ahaz to cheer his heart. "Behold the young woman is with child and she will bear a son" (this I have been assured by Hebrew scholars is the correct rendering). Surely this refers to the prophetess, see Isaiah viii. 3, the child in question being Maher-shalal-hash-baz. "For," says Isaiah, "before the child shall know how to refuse evil and choose the good the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both of her kings." Isaiah vii. 16; see also Isaiah viii. 4.

Before three years had elapsed after this announcement, we learn that the Syrians and many of the Israelites, with the Kings Rezin and Pekah were carried as captives to Assyria, thus the prophecy was fulfilled.

Secondly I would ask how could Ahaz be concerned in a sign that could only be realised many centuries after his death, or how could any promise cheer his heart that was not to be verified in his own days?

There can, I think, therefore be only one conclusion to be drawn, that the child referred to was Maher-shalal-hash-baz, especially when we reflect what the name signified—"Speed the plunder, hasten the spoil."

A MODERN VIEW OF THE ATONEMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your readers are familiar with the name of Mary Carpenter whose marble tablet is fixed in the wall of Bristol Cathedral, with an inscription of national gratitude to her on account of her Reformatory Schools, but they do not perhaps know that Mary Carpenter's father, and afterwards her brother, studied very deeply this subject of the reformation of sin, and its connection with the doctrine of the Atonement and with God's conditions of forgiveness as shown to us in the teachings of Christ. The Rev. Russell Lant Carpenter, this brother, has left us a most able little volume—not orthodox of course, but taking up the modern view that your pages draw attention to—which should be read by every one who will read all sides of this momentous subject; "The Atonement or Reconciliation through Christ," by R. L. Carpenter, B.A. Essex Hall, London.

THE ELEVENTH MUSE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As one of your constant readers I am indebted to Mr. R. Ross for his amusing essay on the Eleventh Muse. At first reading, the lines by a lunatic seem to be nonsense-verses, but careful consideration has convinced me that they are allegorical, as I propose to show.

His hair is red and blue and white,
His face is almost tan.

The colour of the man's hair is unusual, but here we have the key to the enigma. Red, white and blue, are the national colours, hence it is clear the man is John Bull, and this is confirmed by the next two lines:

His brow is wet with blood and sweat,
He steals from where he can.

These verses were probably written when John Bull was at war annexing, conveying, or, as the poet puts it, "stealing," another man's land.

And looks the whole world in the face
A drunkard and a man.

Drunkard here means drunk with glory, possession, and self-satisfaction; and unabashed he looks the whole world in the face. His manhood will not be disputed by any one. I conclude from this analysis that the writer is a little Britainer, probably driven mad by dwelling on Imperialism. This letter I trust will give a clue to his keepers as to his treatment.

THE "NATIVE TONGUE" OF THE IRISH

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Nutt speaks of the Irish being fond of their "native tongue." Quite proper; but the native tongue of eighty-five per cent. of the Irish people in the whole of Ireland and of ninety-five per cent. of the inhabitants of the eastern half is English. That is to say, English is the only language which they or their parents or grandparents have ever spoken or known. I take the figures from the census of 1901. The assumption that the language of the Irish people must be Irish is an instance of the influence of words on thought. We might as well assume that Cornish is the native tongue of Cornish men or British (i.e., Celtic) of the people of Great Britain.

A PASSAGE OF SHAKESPEARE

"O my Lord, my Lord. . . with a halter as another."
1 Henry IV. Act ii. Scene iv.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the various explanations of the above passage, sufficient attention, I think, has not been paid to the present mood of Sir John Falstaff, and the bearing of the word "major." Staunton represents Sir John as vehemently protesting against the admittance of the Sheriff and the Watch. On the contrary, Sir John resents the interruptions of Bardolph and the Hostess with a view to their exclusion, as a mere piece of irrelevancy to the more serious business in hand—his self-laudation: "Play out the play," he has said.

The words, "Dost thou hear, Hal?" are intended to recall the Prince's distracted attention to the interrupted theme, which he again pursues with, "Never call a true piece of gold [meaning himself] a counterfeit: thou art essentially mad without seeming so." The personal turn (to the Prince) that Falstaff's instancing of the genuine article suddenly takes provokes (as might be expected) the retort discourteous from Prince Hal: "And thou a natural coward,—without instinct."

Now Sir John is nothing if not a dialectician; hence his affectation of the term "major" (i.e., premise) and the recurrence of the "if" later on. This categorical proposition of the Prince's—for he will have none of the qualified cowardice of the earlier part of the evening—is the "major" of the text; and Sir John denies it; it is moreover in the power of the Prince to disprove it.

"If you will deny the Sheriff, so."

We all know Sir John's "so," with its mingled tone of resignation and commiseration; if you deny him (he says in effect), there is an end of it; I cannot disprove it; but if you let him enter (and he contemplates with composure the extreme eventualities of an arrest) I will "become a cart" like a "thoroughbred," and so give the lie to your charge of cowardice.

Such is the connection of ideas, obscured (it may be) by Sir John's preference for the syllogistic over the more simple and direct method of statement.

"CONCEALED POETS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—“Minor Poets” are by no means secretive, but perhaps unduly blatant; while the true modesty that keeps a “poet” inedited, is never outspoken.

As to concealed poets, we have to penetrate a concealed meaning; as a fact, however, Francis, commonly called Lord Bacon, a ruined politician, a discredited official, called “the wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind,” the author of the term “concealed poet,” is himself a paradox.

An attempt has been made to place him at the head of our literature as the concealed author of the Shakespearean drama, and this casual remark found among his literary remains is held as evidence thereof.

The term “concealed” might include anonymous and inedited; and we have evidence of the latter, too close to Bacon himself to have escaped his notice. He was a younger son of Sir Nicholas Bacon, Keeper of the Seal under two monarchs; and a worthy bibliophile, Mr. Bertram Dobell of Charing Cross Road, has disinterred twenty or thirty poems written by Sir Nicholas, hitherto unpublished, fully qualifying him as a concealed poet; for even the elaborate account of Sir Nicholas in the D.N.B., has not prepared us for this fact. Can we thus reduce the ambiguous term “concealed poets” to mere commonplace?

LAILÍ AND MAJNÚN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The appearance of a new reprint of Atkinson's version of Lailí and Majnún reviewed in your last issue is another example of a tendency most gratifying for printers, paper-makers and dealers in waste paper, but the advantage of which for other members of the community is not so apparent—to reprint without necessity. My firm reprinted this version in 1894 after it had been out of print for some fifty years. I shall be happy to supply as many copies as are likely to be required, so far as my experience teaches, at 1s. 4d. each. It is difficult to understand the raison d'être of a new reprint.

[In 1888 a series of articles, by the same author, appeared in the South Bucks Free Press, and these form the basis of the present book. Extracts from the Latin are given in English, and the old English has been modernised "where it is likely to present a difficulty." This is to be regretted; but on the whole the volume presents an interesting and substantially accurate sketch of Lollard days in the county of which it has been said that "it had more martyrs and confessors in it before the time of Luther than all the kingdom besides."]

THE BOOKSHELF

MR. HEINEMANN has reached the end of his enterprise of Rembrandt, A Memorial, of which we have the complete work (30s. net) before us. Each of the ten numbers contained three facsimile plates by Schmidt of Paris, and four "Rembrandt" photogravure plates from pictures; and, as each number appeared, we have noted its contents. In the eighth part the Schmidt plates are the famous Three Crosses etching (1653), the equally famous Faustus (c. 1651), and Mr. Heseltine's pen and sepia drawing of Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane. The photogravures show the Buckingham Palace picture of The Lady with the Fan; The Supper at Emmaus (Louvre); The Blinding of Samson (Frankfort); and the Titus van Rijn in the collection of the late M. Rodolphe Kann. The remainder of the plates in the volume are as follows: Schmidt plates; Life-study of a young man, pen and wash (Heseltine); Rembrandt's Mother (circa 1631); The "Hundred Guilder" etching, Christ healing the Sick; A man watching a woman with a sleeping child in her arms, pen and wash (Heseltine); Portrait of Uytenbogaerd, etching; and Rembrandt's Studio, pen and wash (Louvre); Photogravures: Portrait of Elizabeth Bas (Amsterdam); The Mill (Lord Lansdowne); Portrait of a Lady (Amsterdam); Man in Armour (Glasgow); Tobit and his wife with the goat (Berlin); A Winter Landscape (Cassel); Portrait of Jan Six (Six Collections, Amsterdam); and The Ship-builder and his wife (Buckingham Palace). The photogravures are all excellent; if we have a fault to find with any of the plates in the volume it is that the paper on which some of the etchings have been printed is so shiny that the effect of the etching is lost, and the blacks have not the value that they should have. But it is so exceptional to have cause for complaint with any feature of this beautiful book that it seems almost unfair to call attention to a defect. The plates have not been arranged in chronological order in this work, but since each is dated the student or amateur, now the book is complete, will have no difficulty in following the progress of the artist's development with the help of M. Emile Michel's very able monograph, a few pages of which were contained in each number. Here, indeed, is a worthy memorial of the great artist, a work of art in itself and one which will do justice to the art it celebrates. Considering the price usually charged for large art quartos, the production is remarkably cheap, heralding, we hope, an era in which other publishers will be able to follow Mr. Heinemann's example. We notice that those who desire it can obtain at inexpensive rates of Mr. Heinemann "Burlington" proofs in a large size of the following reproductions: The Night Watch, Samson's Marriage Feast, Elizabeth Bas, An Old Rabbi, Saskia van Uijlenburgh, and Titus van Rijn.

The latest addition to Messrs. Geo. Newnes's unique Art Library is Delacroix (3s. 6d. net). At first sight it might be supposed that, Delacroix being, like Titian and Rubens, before all things a great colourist, it might be waste labour to attempt to give any idea of his paintings by reproductions in black and white; but, as M. Henri Frantz points out in a brief but admirable introductory note on the painter, Delacroix was more than a great colourist. He was, in his own peculiar way, a great draughtsman; and even those who have never seen in the Louvre or at Versailles the originals of any of the forty-nine pictures reproduced in this volume will be able to gather from the reproductions a very good idea of the splendour of Delacroix's composition, the richness of his light and shade, the depth and majesty of his conception, and the extraordinary passion with which he animated his pictures. The Prisoner of Chillon, Hamlet and Polonius, The Shipwreck of Don Juan, The Battle of Taillebourg, to name but a few, are superb compositions, glowing with passion, a passion which reached its utmost extremity in the extraordinary Liberty Guiding the People, a very Carmagnole in paint, in which the half-nude woman with rifle and banner soars up in her irresistible course over shattered houses and dead and dying bodies. In every case, it is surprising how clear an idea of the workmanship of the great impassioned artist, so different from an Ingres or a David, may be gained by studying these reproductions, which will certainly, moreover, inspire all who see them to go and admire the originals.

The New Russia. By Lionel Declé. (Eveleigh Nash, 7s. 6d.)—Mr. Declé gives us no definition of the word "popular," which is an unfortunate omission inasmuch as he has written this book to supply the "urgent need" of a "popular book giving in a concise and clear form a general aperçu of the present system under which the administration, the law, education, taxation are organised in Russia." It would be an insult to apply the epithet of popular to Sir Donald Wallace's great book, but at the same time it supplies most admirably the work of which Mr. Declé is apparently ignorant. To take "popular" in another sense is still less satisfactory, for Mr. Declé's apologia for Count Witte will hardly find sympathy in England. It is interesting to meet with a writer who can end every chapter with a little song of praise in honour of the statesman who, he says, will be revered by future generations as the founder of a New Russia, but, as the author also says, Russians are slow of conception. It requires, indeed, a vivid and quick imagination to find in Count Witte the saviour of Russia. If, however, the crushing of the revolution at Moscow was the triumph of law and order, as is affirmed in this book, all things are possible. Mr. Declé no doubt regards the little demonstration at Tiflis in September last as a wonderful example of Christian charity, and General Yatzkievich as a model of all the virtues, but that view would find few supporters outside the circle of Russian bureaucrats. The Czar, we are told, will leave an immortal name for having given to his people a Constitution; and so Mr. Declé prophesies, in spite of his concluding dictum that "there is only one thing impossible in Russia, and that is to understand the Russians." The wisdom of this remark is all the greater because its author is, to judge from his spelling of Russian words, unacquainted with the Russian language. Those final words, however, are a fitting corollary to the opening sentence of the book, in which it is said that Russia is still a land of mystery utterly irreducible to any formula. What object is attained by reducing a land to a formula we do not know. Count Witte should have written an introduction and explained how it is done. Possibly the recipe involves what Mr. Declé calls a progrom, a mysterious thing suggestive of a progrom; but no authority on Russia would be so careless.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE following resolutions were passed by the Publishers' Association and cordially supported by the Associated Booksellers at their annual meeting at Oxford:

1. That second-hand copies of net books shall not be sold under the published price within six months of publication.

2. That new copies of net books shall not be treated as dead stock within twelve months of the date of purchase, nor shall at any time afterwards be sold at a reduction without having been first offered to the publisher at cost price, or at the proposed reduced price, whichever is the lower.

In comment on these resolutions, a librarian sends us the communication that follows. We print the whole of it as it reached us, if only to afford an opportunity for its refutation, and without in any way giving it our support, or agreeing with the opinions expressed in it.

"The 'close time for net books,'" he writes, "is only another step in the endeavour to injure public libraries. It is true the Times is an offender against what are said to be the 'best interests' of the smaller booksellers, but the T.B.C. [Times Book Club] is in a great measure only the whipping-boy. Previous to 1901, booksellers recognised that public libraries were amongst their best customers. Library orders gave no trouble, as the whole of the details of the books required were given; the orders came in regularly in bulk; and from a commercial standpoint libraries required and received preferential treatment, in the matter of discount, over the occasional purchaser of single volumes. In 1901 the number of net books published was 2322 and the value was £983. Last year the number had increased to 4617 and the value had risen to £1480. Side by side with this hardening of the price, a marked deterioration of the material and binding has been going on. Wherever a discount was offered and accepted on net books an opposition tradesman was found to give information to the Association, with the result that the offending tradesman was threatened with a boycott. This caused an increased demand for early second-hand copies of net books. It naturally followed that the larger circulating libraries, which are treated as 'trade,' laid in a stock of a new net book knowing that they could get rid of their surplus copies at a good price—usually at about cost—after they had been in circulation some two or three months. It is this system that the 'close time' has been instituted to combat.

"In the United States, the home of the net book system, the claim of the public library to consideration is recognised, and retailers are allowed to give a discount off net books to these public institutions. No librarian objects to the net book system—it is a perfectly logical one—he only objects to the refusal of publishing houses and booksellers to grant him the same terms that any other tradesman would give to a large buyer. Apart from the books which publishers are only able to put upon the market with success by the support of the larger public libraries, the public library has made markets which otherwise would be non-existent. In addition to the thousands of books required in opening new libraries, at least three hundred and fifty thousand volumes are bought by these 'co-operative book-clubs' yearly. And the more the net book system is extended, and the more cast-iron its regulations become, so much the more will the spending powers of the public libraries be restricted until the removal of the rate limitation is accomplished. The idea seems to be now that public libraries have formed the 'reading-habit' in many millions of people, to abolish them for the benefit of the booksellers.

"Unless publishers and booksellers as a body come to recognise the fact that their 'best interests' are not served by antagonising the public library, the only solution of the difficulty appears to lie in the formation of a co-operative library-booksellers' union; and if an endeavour should be made to treat this as outside the 'trade,' it would naturally undertake publishing also. As it would be able to give a safe market up to a certain point, it could offer the best terms to authors. There is no thought of a threat in this—the matter has never been discussed, or even broached before—it would be but the natural outcome of unnatural conditions. The turnover of such a co-operative society, amongst its public library members alone, would amount, in round figures, to at least one hundred thousand pounds a year."

The spelling of French is far more regular than that of English, but even in France they have felt the need of reform. Some little time ago a Commission was appointed to propose measures for the simplification of spelling, and its report was recently issued. From the Westminster Gazette we take the following, which are among its recommendations: That the letter "y" shall be suppressed whenever it is pronounced as "i," as in "cristal"; that "s" shall take the place of "x" in such plurals as "chevaux"; that the superfluous "h" shall be dropped in such words as "rétorique" and "têatre"; that the French for "egg" shall henceforth be "euf"; that "pan" shall be written instead of "paon," "prent" instead of "prend," "dizième" instead of "dixième," and "exposicion" instead of "exposition."

It is noteworthy that the Académie française, which has in its time done good service to French spelling, is not to be consulted. The measure is to affect schools only; but in all schools the suggested changes are to be made compulsory by Ministerial decree. It is, that is to say, a purely utilitarian measure, designed to save trouble and expense in teaching and learning orthography. Our contemporary declares it to be "at present an open question" whether the change will be adopted by men of letters, "who are not less interested in the French language than the pedagogues." Imagine M. Anatole France writing euf; or M. Brunetière writing of his spiritual head as "Pie Dis," or delivering a conférence on the "Téâtre de Molière"!

Nevertheless, if the Ministerial decree is pronounced, in twenty years all France, men of letters and men who drop all the letters they can, will be writing dizième, exposicion (perhaps we shall be writing that too, since we have given up the word exhibition) and rétorique. Once start a practice in the schools, there is no stopping it. The flood of early acquired habit will swamp, proprio motu, all the barriers set up by scholarship, sentiment or habit.

The International Printing, Stationery and Allied Trades Exhibition, which opened at the Agricultural Hall on Saturday last, shows a great advance on that of 1904, not only in the quality of the work exhibited, but in methods and machinery construction. By far the largest stand is that of the Linotype Company, in the centre of the hall, at which are shown two Miehle Two-Revolution Presses, coupled together for use as a perfecter, with a separate coupling appliance for printing two colours at one feeding—an entirely new departure. The Monoline matrix type-caster and composer—specially adapted for quick changes in type and length of line—has seldom been seen in this country, though it is well known in Australia and on the Continent. Its advantages are apparent, and it is safe to prophesy that it will be adopted by many visitors to the exhibition.

Much the most important development in machinery is the Stringertype matrix composing and casting machine, now exhibited for the first time. It may be described, in a sentence, as a combination of the Linotype and the Monotype without the disadvantages of either. The Monotype, though it casts separate letters instead of the solid block of the Linotype, has a separate casting apparatus. The Stringertype is a "one-man" machine. With the Linotype a single error entails resetting the whole line, and proofs have frequently to wait until the operator has finished the particular "copy" he is setting. With the Stringertype corrections can be made by hand irrespective of the machine, and in this way time is saved, as proofs can be distributed among a number of compositors. In addition, the alignment is less often at fault, and the metal used is much harder than in the Linotype, thus permitting long runs to be made from the type instead of involving stereotyping before working. Want of space prevents our dealing with many other exhibits of importance, but the exhibition as a whole maintains a high level. It might have been made more interesting to the general public (and incidentally more successful from a financial standpoint) if examples of old presses, old machinery, and "case" composition had been shown.

Twice during the past week has the London County Council taken an important step, one forward, the other backward. Its Improvements Committee has pronounced against the suggestions of Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, the Further Strand Improvement Committee and the Royal Institute of British Architects with regard to the portion of the Strand between Wellington Street and the Law Courts; and its Parks and Open Spaces Committee has secured the adoption of a recommendation that County Council concerts shall be given indoors in winter, outdoors in summer, with fees charged for seats and programmes.

With the latter—the forward—step, we are in entire agreement. Objections were raised on account of expense: there need be no expense, if the Council will cease to regard itself as a charitable institution and act as if aware that it is among the number of commercial houses. One gentleman called the proposal "the thin edge of the wedge," the wedge, we presume, of a County Council tea-garden or music-hall—an undertaking which might provide not only wholesome amusement, but make a handsome profit. The most ingenious objection came from a Mr. Pigott, who "hoped the parks would be kept for those who went into them to hear the songs of the birds." At eight, nine or ten P.M.? If there is no music in our parks and open spaces, there is apt to be rowdyism, hoarse laughter and screams, enough to frighten even a bird so full of spirit as to sing by night. Music—even the "niggers and pierrots" dreaded by the same objector—smooths the savage beast by occupying its mind. And wholesome amusement is always better than the alternative, unwholesome amusement. The only question is, will the Council be able to find paying audiences? Any attempt to provide further free amusement than is given already must be sternly checked.

The other matter, the refusal to adopt the suggested improvements to the Strand, it is clearly useless to discuss. A unique opportunity was offered, and has been thrown away. The eastern end of the Strand might have been made one of the most beautiful spots in any city in the world. Timidity will have given it the distressing effect of a good thing spoiled. Another question rises in the mind: What sort of building is it that will block up that corner of the eastern horn of the crescent? Something of terra-cotta and plate glass? That we can build still is clear to any one who has studied Mr. Willett's houses and the great new block in Sloane Square: Bond Street has recently seen the other side of the picture.

The recently issued Report of the National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty, for the year 1905-1906, shows much good work done, and many attempts that have unfortunately been frustrated. Lord Cadogan made it impossible for the Trust to save Paradise Row, Chelsea; the quarry-owners are ruining the Cheddar Gorge and the Gorge of the Avon by Bristol; but against these failures we have to set the Gowbarrow and Aira Force purchases and the Hindhead preservation, which have been already widely discussed, and many minor acquisitions and timely interferences with destruction. It is interesting to note that the "small donor" played a large part in finding the money for the purchase of Gowbarrow. One working-woman of Sheffield sent a postal order.

It is much to be hoped that the Trust will be able to find the £1000 necessary to save Barrington Court, Somerset, a sixteenth-century house of Gothic detail that marks, as few others, the transition from pure Gothic to Renaissance. The house has been stripped of all its fittings and is falling to pieces, so that prompt action is necessary. Meanwhile, it is good to note that Mr. R. W. Raper has saved the Herefordshire Beacon in the Malverns from quarrying by purchasing the quarrying rights and making them over under stringent conditions to the Conservators. The Committee on Ancient Earthworks and Fortified Enclosures, whose Report we have also before us, has a long list of destruction, threatened or accomplished, due to quarrying.

The farm of Mont St. Jean, which has been sold and is to be demolished unless a public subscription intervenes, is described by Comte Louis Cavens as "toute pleine de faits d'histoire." The Count hopes that the "act of vandalism" may yet be stopped. Now, the farm in question is on the east side of the Charleroi road, about a quarter of a mile south of the point where, in the hamlet of Mont St. Jean, the chaussée to Nivelles branches off to the south-west. Half a mile or so south of the farm the Charleroi road is intersected at right angles by the cross road from Wavre and Obain to Braine l'Allend; that cross road marked the front of Wellington's position with the exception of the advanced posts at Hougomont, La Haye Sainte, Papelotte and La Haye. It will be seen, therefore, that the farm was behind the Allies' line, and is not nearly of so much importance as a relic as, for instance, Hougomont. The Mont St. Jean farm was used as the headquarters of the medical department, and it was probably to one of the barns attached to it that Sir William de Lancey was carried when he was wounded.

The Brussels correspondent of the Times states that the museum and hotel at the foot of the Belgian lion are for sale. The museum is well known to all who have visited the battlefield, as it contains a number of interesting and genuine relics. It was founded by Sergt.-Major Cotton, of the 7th Hussars, the author of "A Voice from Waterloo." He lived at Waterloo after being discharged from the regiment, and on his death in 1849 was buried in the orchard of Hougomont by the side of Capt. Blackwood, who fell in the battle. It is to be hoped that the museum will fall into good hands and that the contents will not be dispersed. The same correspondent states that the whole battlefield appears to be doomed, as the local authorities propose to run a roadway across the centre, with building allotments on either side.

Last Sunday week an interesting performance took place within the walls of the Gallo-Roman theatre now in course of restoration at Champlieu on the edge of the forest of Compiègne; the Cyclops and the Iphigenia of Euripides were interpreted, in French translations made by M. Alfred Poizat and M. Jean Moreas respectively, by members of the Comédie-Française and the Odéon, including M.M. Coquelin cadet and Sylvain. M. Damartin-Beaumetz attended as Under-Secretary of Fine Arts, and of the four thousand or more persons who sought admission many were turned away for want of space. Champlieu has long been known for its Gallo-Roman remains; but the excavations begun under the Second Empire were abandoned and it was not until last year that the Minister of Public Instruction appointed a commission to consider the development of the work.

The renewed clearings confirm the opinion that the theatre was semi-circular, with a diameter of over four hundred feet. The stage and proscenium can be easily traced, while the vomitories remain intact. The tiers of seats have almost entirely disappeared. Close at hand are to be seen a small temple and a bath, together with portions of statues. The performance, a very impressive one under the brilliant sky, was organised by the Société des Fouilles Archéologiques, president, M. Babelon, in the interest of a fund for pursuing the excavation and restoration of the remains.

The author of the article on Chatterton's Poems which appeared in last week's ACADEMY desires to say that the word "poet" on p. 34, column 2, four lines from the bottom, should be "nobleman."

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge announce a two days' sale on July 23 and following day of Illuminated Manuscripts, Rare Books and Tracts printed in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (four with autographs of Ben Jonson) scarce American Tracts, early writings on Astrology and Witchcraft, Missals, and some Historical and Poetical Manuscripts. The books are from the libraries of Mr. Thomas Forbes Kelsall, Mr. F. A. Crisp, and others. One of the most interesting items is a very large and generally sound copy of the 1550 edition printed at Zurich of Coverdale's translation "into Englyshe" of "The Whole Byble." This is the largest and best copy that has been offered for sale for years.

Amongst other important lots are the following: "London's Triumphs, with Speeches and Songs on the inauguration of the Lord Mayor, 1677," by Thomas Jordan, City Poet Laureate, 1677 (an uncut copy); First Editions of Keats's Endymion and Lamia; the very rare 1817 edition (first) of Shelley's Proposal for Putting Reform to the Vote throughout the Kingdom; First Editions of Shelley's Revolt of Islam, Alastor, Rosalind and Helen, The Cenci, Prometheus Unbound, Hellas, Adonais, and other works; first editions of Richardson's Pamela (very scarce), Sir Charles Grandison and Clarissa; a large paper copy of Byron's Hours of Idleness, 1807; autograph letters of Benjamin Franklin to one of his sons, dated 1771 and 1773; a very rare Franklin item, Eloge Civique de Benjamin Franklin, Paris, 1790; a presentation copy from the author to Charles Cotton of the first edition (1649) of Richard Lovelace's Lucasta; the Manuscript of the great preacher Whitefield's Account of the first part of his Life, begun in 1739 on board the Elizabeth bound from England to Philadelphia; a copy printed on vellum (one of seven) of the Kelmscott Press Edition of Keats's Poems; a fine copy of the extremely scarce first edition of Thomas Heywood's Apology for Actors, which contains a reference on the last leaf to the volume of poems just then published under the title of The Passionate Pilgrime.

The Astrological books include Chambers's Treatise against Judicial Astrologie (dedicate to the Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, Sir Thomas Egerton), first edition, 1601; and William Lilly's Astrological Almanacks for 1672, 1673 and 1674. Three very scarce tracts occur on the first day on the subject of the Deserved death of the base and insolent Tyrant the Marquis d'Ancre, the most unworthie Marshall of France, 1617; and a curious book to be sold on the same day is The Church Triumphant, or a Comfortable Treatise, wherein is proved that the number of the Damned is inferior to that of the Elect, by Jos. Alford, of Oriell College in Oxford, 1649. Some very curious books which will be offered are The Reformed Commonwealth of Bees, with the Reformed Virginian Silkworm, containing many choice and excellent secrets, published at the West End of S. Paules, 1655; The Triall of Witchcraft, shewing the True and Right Methode of the Discovery, by John Cotta, original edition, 1616; Richard Harvey's Philadelphus, or a Defence of Brutes, black letter, Original Edition, 1593; and Here Begynnethe a Good Boke of Medecins called the Treasure of Poore Men, black letter, London, about 1540, an extremely scarce book.

The Proprietors of Tit-Bits, The Strand Magazine, The Grand Magazine, and Woman's Life have arranged with the Committee of the National Art Union to hold a Great Art Drawing on Wednesday November 21, 1906, at the Queen's Hall, Langham Place, London, W., for the special benefit of the Readers of those papers and magazines. The prizes will be as follows: First Prize, value £500; Second Prize, value £250; Third Prize, value £100; Three Prizes of £50 value each; Five Prizes of £20 value each, and five thousand or more other prizes. The above amounts will be provided and expended by the Committee of the National Art Union, and the pictures will be selected by them (giving the winners a choice) from paintings in the Royal Academy and other leading exhibitions. Full particulars may be found in any of the papers mentioned.

The new museum of Malmaison, near Paris, is now open to the public. Malmaison is the house in which Napoleon stayed when First Consul, and whither Joséphine retired to live after her divorce. The house has been much altered by successive owners, but the furniture, much of which has been presented by the Empress Eugénie from her château of Arenenberg near Lake Constance, is all authentically Napoleonic. It includes Napoleon's private correspondence casket, a little mahogany box, Napoleon's bureau, at which he sat planning the campaign of 1805 and the chair he sat in, and Joséphine's harp.

The following are among forthcoming events:

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge. Friday, July 20.—Sale of Books and Manuscripts. Monday, July 23 and Tuesday, July 24.—Sale of Books, Manuscripts and Engravings, including the library of Mr. Thomas Forbes Kelsall and others.

LITERATURE

THE EVOLUTION OF THE BOSS

Coniston. By WINSTON CHURCHILL. (Macmillan, 6s.)

IF we bear in mind what was accomplished in the way of social reform by the novels of Charles Reade it will be found not easy to condemn the "novel with a purpose." No doubt, the existence of a conscious purpose militates against a romance as a work of art, yet even a pamphlet may be entertaining. Whatever the original idea with which Mr. Winston Churchill started, he has succeeded in making an amusing book of "Coniston." He has combined an elucidation of the American boss and his system with an engaging love-story. Jethro Bass has had his portrait drawn at full length, and, but for a defect which we shall endeavour to point out, it might well have been ranged in a gallery of masterpieces. But in our opinion the novelist has sacrificed consistency of human nature to the exigencies of his story. Most of the action takes place during the presidency of General Grant, and the characters nearly all begin life at Coniston, a township, or rather district, then in course of development. Jethro's first start as a politician lay in making adroit use of certain mortgages. It will serve our purpose better to quote one little interview that took place before the election than to describe that election at length:

Eben appeared at the door, a little dishevelled in hair and beard, for he had been sleeping.

"Haow be you Jethro?" he said nervously. Jethro nodded.

"Weather looks a mite soft."

No answer.

"About that interest," said Eben, plunging into the dread subject, "don't know as I'm ready this month after all."

"G-goin' to town meetin', Eben?"

"Wahn't callatin' to," answered Eben.

"G-goin' to town meetin', Eben?"

Eben, puzzled and dismayed, ran his hand through his hair.

"Wahn't callatin' to—but I kin—I kin."

"D-Democrat—hain't ye—D-Democrat?"

"I kin be," said Eben. Then he looked at Jethro, and added in a startled voice, "Don't know but what I be—Yes, I guess I be."

"H-heerd the ticket?"

Yes, Eben had heard the ticket. What man had not. Some one has been most industrious, and most disinterested, in distributing that ticket.

"Hain't a mite of hurry about the interest right now—right now," said Jethro. "M-may be along the third week in March—may be—c-can't tell."

And Jethro clucked to his horse, and drove away.

Here we have the American politician in embryo; but it was necessary that the novelist should make a complex personality of him, and we have the finer part coming out in his love for the beauty of Coniston, Cynthia Ware. But at the critical moment, when, after much waiting, he finds out that his love is returned, he will not make the sacrifice required, which is that he should forego the political influence illegitimately won by the power of the mortgage. She was ready, like ripe fruit, to fall into his arms, but not unless he made that sacrifice to her integrity.

"You did not know what you were doing," she said. "I was sure of it, or I would not have come to you. Oh, Jethro! you must stop it—you must prevent this election."

Her eyes met his, her own pleading, and the very wind without seemed to pause for his answer. But what she asked was impossible. That wind which he himself had loosed, which was to topple over institutions, was rising, and he could no more have stopped it than he could have hushed the storm.

"You will not do what I ask—now?" she said, very slowly. Then her voice failed her, she drew her hands together, and it was as if her heart had ceased to beat. Sorrow and anger and fierce shame overwhelmed her, and she turned from him in silence and went to the door.

"Cynthy," he cried hoarsely, "Cynthy!"

"You must never speak to me again," she said, and was gone into the storm.

Yes, she had failed. But she did not know that she had left something behind which he treasured as long as he lived.

This was part of the unscrupulousness later to be urged against him without defence, and we are told that it persisted throughout his life. But then he appears continually in the light of a philanthropist; and that is, we think, where Mr. Winston Churchill fails. It is Sir Thomas Browne, we believe, who says something to the effect that the light sin plays only like a summer cloud over the soul of youth and leaves no mark behind it, but after thirty the occasional error deepens and hardens into a habit of vice. As Robert Burns sing of a different fault: "But oh, it it hardens a' within and petrifies the feelings." In the case of Jethro Bass we find that instead of this natural development his long course of unscrupulous intrigue only makes him the more sentimental. The love-story to which we have alluded is only a prelude to the real drama. Cynthia Ware departs, becomes a school teacher and eventually marries a literary man, who is something less than a poet and more than a journalist. To him she bears a daughter, Cynthia Wetherell, the real heroine of the story. Jethro loves her as though she had been his own child, and by one of those coincidences which are permitted to novelists this girl falls in love with the son of his greatest rival. The battle of these two raged over a very small matter, namely the appointment of a local postmaster. Jethro Bass wins with the aid of one of those acute dodges which seem to come natural to him; but his rival thereupon opens a terrific campaign in the Press, his most important artillery coming in the shape of a leading article which seems to sum up, in a way that renders reply impossible, the character and career of Jethro Bass. The following is a description of this attack:

The article was an arraignment of Jethro Bass—and a terrible arraignment indeed. Step by step it traced his career from the beginning, showing first of all how he had debauched his own town of Coniston; how, enlarging on the same methods, he had gradually extended his grip over the county, and finally over the state; how he had bought and sold men for his own power and profit, deceived those who had trusted in him, corrupted governors and legislators, congressmen and senators, and even justices of the courts; how he had trafficked ruthlessly in the enterprises of the people. Instance upon instance was given, and men of high prominence from whom he had received bribes were named, not the least important of these being the Honorable Alva Hopkins of Gosport.

This, no doubt, is a very fair description of the American boss of the time. Mr. Winston Churchill is doing good service by exposing him, but, if the accusations were—as they seem to have been—unanswerable, it is pretty evident that, in a slang phrase appropriate to the occasion, at threescore and ten Mr. Jethro Bass must have been "a hard nut," and the very last person in whom we should expect to find a development of remorse. When Cynthia hears of the attack, following the instinct of a lady, she goes direct to her guardian, and this is how she found out:

He was standing with his foot upon the sawbuck and the saw across his knee, he was staring at the woodpile, and there was stamped upon his face a look which no man or woman had ever seen there, a look of utter loneliness and desolation, a look as of a soul condemned to wander forever through the infinite, cold spaces between the worlds—alone.

It is here that we think a false note is struck. It would surprise us very much indeed to find the bosses of to-day, the iron and cotton and oil kings who have been guilty of practices at least as shameful as any of those laid to the charge of Jethro Bass, torn with regret for their misdeeds. In other words, the novel, when tried on the touchstone of nature, does not stand the test. It is a version of the trick of the old-fashioned romantics, who were in the habit of showing tears of repentance in the eyes of the most hoary-headed sinners just before the climax was reached. Needless to say, Jethro gives up his evil ways at the request of this girl, whom he regards with paternal love, although in the days of his generous youth he would not yield to her passionately adored mother on a smaller point of the same kind. He retires to his shop, only to emerge once more for the purpose of checking the last villainy of his great rival. But now he is no longer an unscrupulous adventurer, but a noble knight sallying forth to redeem a lady's fortune. Thus, we think, our assertion is made good that the author of this remarkable novel just falls short of real greatness. It is as if Dumas had given a death-bed repentance to Mazarin, or as if Smollett had put a virtuous crown on the life of Count Fathom. In other respects, however, the novel is one well worthy of attention. Its characters are, perhaps, too numerous, reminding us in their multitude and complexity of America itself, but they are all drawn with vigour and animation. The women are delightful, and a genuine humour twinkles over the whole book, making it very pleasant indeed to read.

MODERN LATIN VERSE

The Ancient Mariner. Rendered into Latin elegiacs by Rev. REGINALD BROUGHTON, M.A. (Oxford: Parker, 1s. net.)

It was a very difficult task which Mr. Broughton essayed when he rendered "The Ancient Mariner" into elegiac verse. When a fond mother told Dr. Johnson how difficult was the piece which her daughter had just played on the piano, the grim critic said: "Madam, I would it had been impossible." We are disposed to say the same about Mr. Broughton's feat. He is obviously an excellent scholar of great taste and saturated with Ovid. But the measures of Ovid are alien from "The Ancient Mariner." Hexameters would have been far more suitable. A glorified ballad which takes the form of a weird narrative would go best of all in the galliambics of the "Atys" of Catullus; but that difficult metre could hardly be successfully maintained through more than five hundred verses. The art of translating English into Latin or Greek poetry is a charming one, and we are pleased to find that it still has its fascination for scholars; but we think it is far better applied to short pieces than to poems of five or six hundred lines. Translations into Latin and Greek verse ought to be as perfect as cameos, and this flawlessness cannot be assured for hundreds of lines. There will be here and there a failure. "May'st hear the merry din" does not find its true counterpart in "Audin' ut erumpant murmura laetitiae"; and the same may be said of "Quales accipiat mens stupefacta sonos" for "Like noises in a swoon" and of "Exhausit trepidus cor mihi molle pavor" for "Fear at my heart as at a cup my life-blood seem'd to sip." Would one without the English understand:

Scilicet e nebulis nivibusque advenerat ulnis
Altior usque novem pone secutus iter?

Is there any authority for reptilia with the ante-penult long? The word is quite post-classical, and would more naturally be reptilis than reptilis. If there is any authority for the quantity which Mr. Broughton has assumed, perhaps he will write to the ACADEMY, and I will gladly cry peccavi. There are passages where a word must have been omitted, where the verse cannot be scanned as printed. Such are:

Corpore tute es longo macer oreque fulvo
Nunc porro enixa aegre nunc ire retrorsum

Again, barbarus is not "cruel" and sinus is not "the heart":

Pulvere fiebat siccior inde sinus is not Latin for "made my heart as dry as dust."

∴ Mr. Broughton has shown much scholarship and ingenuity in accomplishing his difficult task; he has used abscondere and imbuerere idiomatically and well, and we could quote many ingenious passages. We must content ourselves with one or two—the beautiful passage about "the leafy month of June":

Vox ea desiderat; gratum tamen inde susurrum
Fecere ad medium carbasa mota diem,
Quale ciet in murmur, cum Junia frondibus arbor
Luxuriat, tecto tramite rivus aquae,
Qui tacitis silvis mollique sopore sepultis
Nocturnus blandum temperat usque modum.

Again:

The air is cut away before
And closes from behind is a difficult phrase to render neatly, but the difficulty is adroitly met by:

Scilicet ante ratem lentus proscinditur aer,
Orbis et a tergo sectus uterque coit.

In a word, the poem is too long for a Latin version, especially in elegiacs. Even the late Dean Merivale's "Hyperion" suffered from its length, though it was a fine piece of work in spite of one false quantity, vilitantis.

Verses in the dead languages are most pleasing when they are short, perhaps most of all when they are more or less comic, bringing out the contrast between the dignified language and the ridiculous theme. That delightful book, "Oxford Echoes" has many such pieces; for instance, the "Ode to Tobacco" in finished iambs by that admirable scholar, A. Sidgwick:

ἐνεγκάτω τις πῦρ βρυαντομαϊκόν,
(καύσαι δ' ἀδύνατον μὴ οὐχὶ πρὸς κίστην τριβέειν).

Bryant and May ought to have this inscription on their matches "igniting only on the box."

Let the fortunate possessor of "Oxford Echoes" turn to the same scholar's version of the piece set to Verdant Green at his sham matriculation: "She went into the garden to cut a cabbage to make an apple pie." . . . "What, no soap? So he died, and she very imprudently married the barber," appears thus:

τί γάρ; κοίτας ἄρ' ἔχει σ' ἀγγλία;
ὁ δ' οὐκ ἀπώλεθ'· ἡ δ' ἀπροσκόπος κακοῦ κῆδος ξυνήψε τῷ ξύρῳ ἐπιστάτη.

The "laudes oti" by A. Godley is charming:

Nota discunt alii remigandi iura,
Qua premendus arte sit venter inter crura;
Haec est vitae ratio longe nimis dura:
Nulla nobis cutis est deterendae cura.

Habitu levissimo magna pars induto
Pellunt pilas pedibus, concidunt in luto:
Hos, si potest fieri, stultiores puto
Atque tantum similes animali bruto.

Aliis contrariis usus disciplinis
Procul rivo vivit et Torpidorum vinis:
Nullus unquam ponitur huic legendi finis:
Vescitur radicibus Graecis et Latinis:

Mihi cum ut subeam Moderationes
Tutor suadet anxius "frustra" inquam "mones:
Per me licet ignibus universas dones
Aeschylī palmarias emendationes."

There is another admirable bit of Latin rhyme touching the Agricultural Depression and its impoverishing effect on the College of St. John:

Praesidens confectus annis
Sedet vix opertus pannis
In Collegio Johannis.

Nam nec praedia vendendo
Nec impensas minueudo
Erit amplius solvendo.

Dicit "Agriculturalis
Nunc Depressio fit talis
Ut conficiamur malis.

Summus inter Praesidentes,
Sociique esurientes,
Egestatem vix ferentes,

Quondam sole sub sereno
Qui gaudebant sinu pleno
Labant aere alieno."

These verses are not, of course, classical. Agriculturalis Depressio is not Ciceronian; but yet one can see that the writer is a scholar. It is, however, quite possible to write comic Latin verses without violating the Ciceronian idiom. Verses like those in the "Oxford Echoes" will have more readers than versions of Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" or Keats's "Hyperion."

In illustration of a remark made above, that the humour lies in the contrast between the inanity of the English and the dignity of the dead language, we would add a Greek and a Latin version from E. Lear's Book of Nonsense. The first ends with an Aeschylean two-worded senarius; the second has the Ennian imesis of cerebrum.

There once was a lady of Russia
Who scream'd so that no one could hush her,
Her screams were extreme,
You ne'er heard such a scream
As was scream'd by this lady of Russia.

γυνή ποτ' ἀβάτοις ἔμπολις Σκυθῶν γύαις ἔρρηξ' ἰσχυρὴ οὐ φίλοις κατὰσχετον, λαμπρὰν, διατόρον, οὐχ ὑπερτοξεύσιμον γυναικογυρτοῖσιν ὀρθιδάμασιν.

There once was a lady of Troy
 Whom sev'ral small flies did annoy :
 Some she kill'd with a thump,
 Some she drown'd at the pump,
 And some she took with her to Troy.

Troada ne taceam praestantem Troasin : illa,
 Forte lacessita heu ! muscis et peste minuta,
 Ingestis colaphis harum cere comminuit brum.
 Has autem ad puteum raptas absumpsit in undis,
 At reliquas reduces cum virgine Troia recepit.

DISESTABLISHMENT IN FRANCE

À Propos de la Séparation des Églises et de l'État. Par PAUL SABATIER. (Paris, Librairie Fischbacher, 3 fr.)

Disestablishment in France. By PAUL SABATIER. With a Preface by the translator, ROBERT DELL. (Fisher Unwin, 3s. 6d.)

AMONG the publications on the subject of the separation of religious communities from the State in France few have attracted wider attention than the work of M. Paul Sabatier which has now reached a fourth edition. It has been translated by Mr. Robert Dell, who has written an interesting and instructive preface and added an appendix giving the text of the Separation Law of December 10, 1905, both in French and English, accompanied by valuable notes.

M. Sabatier is a disciple of Rénan. Like that brilliant person he has written on St. Francis of Assisi in a manner revealing deep spiritual insight and wide sympathy with various manifestations of religious life. In the book under review he contends that the separation of Church from State was, sooner or later, inevitable, and has not been forced upon France by an organised band of anti-Christian fanatics. To this extent he is right, but he is not completely just to those Frenchmen who look askance at the recent ecclesiastical legislation. Many regard it as an attempt to destroy the Christian religion and a legacy from the great Revolution. But it is untrue to say that there was in 1789 a general desire to make war upon the Church. Sieyès, in one of the most remarkable of his writings, "Délibérations à prendre par les Assemblées des Bailliages," explains the objects of the Revolution and does not even allude to ecclesiastical questions as among the problems pressing for solution. A few years later, however, an organised anti-Christian movement became perceptible and has ever since, notwithstanding periods of reaction, grown in strength. A leading member of the present French Ministry expressed a wish to see the Madeleine turned into a place of amusement and a hope that France would renounce the Oriental religion she has professed so long. M. Sabatier exposes with great skill the follies of the clericals, but does not explain with equal clearness that the extreme anti-Christian faction, from the days of Chaumette and Romme to the present hour, has steadily strengthened the power of the Obscurantist and Ultramontane section in the French Church. These antagonistic forces—the anti-Christian and the Ultramontane—have, each in its different way, worked evil to the Christian religion. It may, however, fairly be contended that the Ultramontane has been the more mischievous of the two. Its conduct as regards Leo Taxil is a striking instance in point. This man whose real name was Gabriel Jogand-Pagès was educated by the Jesuits. He became a journalist and, about 1879, made himself conspicuous by attacks on the clergy. He published an infamous book entitled "Les Amours Secrètes de Pie IX" and other works so abominable that all respectable people were disgusted. To acquire a new position he suddenly, in April 1885, announced his conversion. This was regarded in Ultramontane circles as a miracle of grace, and the Papal Nuncio himself relieved him of the excommunication de lata sententia. Taxil then proceeded in numerous writings to reveal the secrets of Freemasonry. These productions, full of the most indecent and unspeakably absurd stories, were widely read and implicitly believed by simple-minded people. The basis of his "Revelations" was that Freemasons worshipped the Devil. Others took up the tale, among them an Italian, Domenico Margotta, who published at Grenoble a volume on the worship of Satan, prefaced by the apostolic benediction of Mgr. Fava, Bishop of the Diocese. Leo XIII. showed his approval of the work by conferring on its author the Order of the Holy Sepulchre. Mgr. Fava himself produced a book entitled "Le Secret de la Franc-Maçonnerie," the appearance of which was greeted by the Pope with a Latin poem which appeared in the Univers of June 7, 1898. All ecclesiastical journals in France devoted a portion of their space to "Revelations" and Leo XIII. appointed in 1896 a Commission to inquire into Freemasonry, which convened an International Congress at Trent. This Congress, at which thirty-six bishops were present, met at the end of September, and Leo Taxil was the hero of the hour. He professed to have received some of his "Revelations" from a young Englishwoman, Diana Vaughan. Among her marvellous stories was one of a séance at Malta during which Lucifer himself appeared and, at her request, conjured up one of her ancestors. She alleged that Admiral Markham, on receiving his command in the Mediterranean, was made "grand maître d'honneur" of the "Parfait triangle" at Malta which possessed a wonderful talisman, "la flèche de fer." When he read her account of that séance he expressed his disbelief in it to Captain Hughes, whereupon "la flèche de fer" planted itself in his breast and carried him to Charlestown, where, becoming alive, it asked him: "Dost thou now believe?" On his replying in the affirmative, he was transported back to Malta and there relieved of the talisman in the presence of Captain Hughes. This preposterous story may be read in the "Mémoires d'une ex-Palladiste, parfaite initiée, indépendante," by any one who has a reader's ticket for the British Museum. At the Congress of Trent four German priests had common sense enough to press for some definite information about Diana Vaughan, and ultimately Taxil was forced to announce that he would bring her to a meeting in Paris convened for April 19, 1897. He appeared there and told his audience that Diana Vaughan was a myth and that he had been trying for ten years to sound the unfathomable stupidity of Catholics. He then escaped and has never been heard of since. Mr. Dell reminds us that Cardinal Meiry del Val, one of the dupes of Taxil, is now the Papal Secretary of State and the right-hand man of Pius X. Perhaps one of the most stinging remarks in Loisy's "Autour d'un petit livre" is that the official Church has never shown disapprobation of the imposture. He might have added that, on the contrary, marks of favour and distinction have been showered on men who were its conspicuous supporters.

The attitude of ecclesiastical authority in this matter could not but strengthen the conviction of those anti-clericals who hold that the Church exercises a debasing influence on mankind. They forget, however, that while its rulers remain obscurantist a remarkable change is taking place, particularly among the younger clergy. M. Sabatier points out that Loisy's works must at first have been read chiefly in clerical circles. He soon, however, riveted the eyes of all and has become the champion of a movement irresistible and certain to influence profoundly the Catholic mind of Europe. Its progress cannot now be arrested seriously by any action of the official Church, for, as he says himself of attempts to crush him:

Il s'est trouvé que celui qu'on voulait surtout abattre était un exégète fantôme qui avait derrière lui une Idée. Chaque fois qu'il a mordu la poussière l'Idée s'est relevée l'instant d'après, souriante et forte et l'Ombre d'exégète a continué ses périlleux exercices. On ne tue pas les Idées à coup de bâton.

A Jesuit, Father Portalié, lifted up his hands to Heaven and cried: "This is the end of Catholicism," but Sabatier is right when he says that it is rather the rising of new sap in the old religious trunk. He quotes from Demain, a Catholic periodical lately started at Lyons, the following extract, which illustrates what is passing in the mind of many Frenchmen:

Catholic France is dying, but she is succumbing far less to the attacks of her enemies than to her own short-comings and to the disfigurements which she has inflicted on herself with her own hand. Cursory observers are surprised at the failure of our religion, which, in fact, is neither understood nor practised rightly, to preserve the spiritual life which is ebbing away from us. Yet no phenomenon could be more explicable than this sterility. Catholic France is becoming less and less Christian. Certainly the external forms of religion remain, but the vessel of election is daily voiding itself of its spiritual and moral content. To such an extent is this the case that with many of our people there survives little more than a habit of forms and ceremonies of which they no longer know the inner significance or experience the fruitfulness. Can one be astonished if the phantom of religion continues to be ineffective? It is our business first of all to heal ourselves of our own disease. It is clearly demonstrated that we must seek primarily in ourselves the symptoms of social decadence which so many Pharisees, for ever smiting the breasts of others, take a melancholy pleasure in lamenting, without ever having the humility to lay the blame on themselves. . . .

If Christianity is to survive in France it must cut itself off from all the parties of reaction, from intellectual no less than from political and social reaction. The critical spirit has penetrated every domain. Nothing can stop its progress. The better way is to accommodate ourselves to it and to make use only of scientific methods. For us every demonstrated truth will be a real truth.

M. Sabatier anticipates great and saving results from his country when France begins to recognise as the witnesses for her ancient faith men of intellectual honesty and religious life; loving and loyal children of the past, but not its slaves. It may be that dark and evil days are at hand for those distinguished Roman Catholics who desire to bring the teaching of their Church into harmony with the ascertained truths of science. Though some of them may suffer, they are all animated by the "sure and certain hope" of the ultimate and not far distant triumph of their cause.

"HURLING TIME"

The Great Revolt of 1381. By CHARLES OMAN, M.A. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 8s. 6d. net.)

It has generally been recognised that Wat Tyler's "Hurling Time" forms a landmark in the history of the English peasant. The late Professor Thorold Rogers held that it put an end, practically speaking, to the old manorial system. Professor Oman, with the aid of the documents collected by the late André Réville, has set out to controvert this view. He has succeeded at least in showing that Professor Thorold Rogers drew too broad a generalisation. "Conditions varied from manor to manor, and from county to county, and the action of the lords was dependent on the particular case before them." Mr. Oman's case rests on the proof that there were many different causes for the rebellion. Hitherto it has been associated with the growth of sheep-farming, which, of course, rendered the old style of cultivation inconvenient. That has been the view of our agricultural writers, but, as far as we can see, Mr. Oman has not devoted much attention to that side of the question. He dismisses as not much more than an accident the collection of the poll-tax. No doubt it was unpopular, but the story that Wat Tyler struck down a collector who had insulted his daughter seems to be little more than one of those myths which popular fancy very often attaches to history. Wat Tyler himself, as far as we can learn, was one of the strong and turbulent figures that must have been common in England after a prolonged period of war. He was accused of being a highwayman, and in all probability this was true enough. That he had some knowledge of the organisation of warfare is quite evident, and we can very easily imagine what Shakespeare would have made of the famous scene between him and King Richard II. In fact, a transposition of names is all that is required to fit into his mouth the words that Shakespeare gives to Jack Cade. Mr. Oman draws a vigorous picture of the insurgent leader on the Friday night before the meeting at Smithfield, boasting in his loud and vainglorious manner that he would go wherever he listed at the head of twenty thousand men, that he would "shave the beards" (a euphemism for cutting off the heads) of all who dared to oppose him, vowing, that in the course of four days there should be no laws in England save those which proceeded from his own mouth, and probably adding that "the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer; all the realm shall be in common; and in Cheapside shall my palfrey go to grass." When Richard repied to the representations made that he would grant all he could "saving the regalities of his crown," the demagogue took his words as a refusal. He called for a flagon of beer, which he tossed off at a draught, made a long harangue, and clambered on his horse. At this moment a Kentish retainer who was riding behind the king declared that he recognised in Wat Tyler a notorious thief and highwayman, upon which Wat, "wagging his head at him in his malice," bade him come out from among the others. On his refusal, the rebel unsheathed his dagger and pushing in among the royal retinue evidently meant to stab him from whom the taunt came. Walworth, the Mayor, intervened and received the dagger in his stomach, but fortunately for himself he wore a coat of mail and took no harm. In return he whipped out his cutlass and struck Tyler so that he fell on his horse's neck, and, immediately after, one of the king's folkers ran him twice through the body with a sword. Tyler cried: "Treason!" and then, mortally wounded, fell from his horse and great confusion arose. It was then that Richard made the royal speech which has been so variously reported. The version given by Mr. Oman is as follows:

Sirs, will you shoot your King? I will be your chief and captain, you shall have from me that which you seek. Only follow me into the fields without.

Mr. Oman does not consider it to be accurate because, in point of fact, the king could have had little time for anything but a hurried ejaculation. But it sufficed, and the rebellion in Kent was quelled. That the fires of it still burned on the Eastern coast and even as far as the Northern counties and broke out sporadically in various counties seems to show that a very wide conspiracy was on foot. One of the objects at which the insurgents aimed was evidently the destruction of legal documents. These were times wherein lawyers were hated. The Church, too, came in for a certain amount of trouble. Those who held Abbey lands had shown great harshness and arrogance, ruling the serfs and villeins with a rod of iron. There is nothing more interesting in the book than the careful account of the rising at St. Albans. The abbot at the time was Thomas de la Mare, "a hard-handed and litigious priest much hated by his vassals." Rude expression was given to this dislike.

The whole of the townsfolk set to work to make an end of the outward and visible signs of the abbot's seigniorial authority over them. They drained his fish-pond, broke down the hedges of his preserves, killed his game, and cut up and divided among themselves certain plots of his domain-ground. They hung a rabbit at the end of a pole on the town pillory, as a token that the game-laws were abolished. But it was not only rabbits that were killed that day: the mob entered the abbot's prison, and held a sort of informal session on its inmates. They acquitted and dismissed all the captives save one, a notorious malefactor, whom they condemned and executed, fixing up his head alongside of the dead rabbit.

Mr. Oman is careful to point out that the animus against the Church was not theological in its character. If clerical landlords were attacked, it was because they were landlords, not because they were clerics; and if large numbers of poor parsons appear among the reformers, it was because of their personal discontent, not because of their religious opinions. There was very little church-breaking or other sacrilege performed during the rebellion. The various classes connected with the movement may be seen from the following :

In Norfolk and Suffolk we find not only, as has been already pointed out, an extraordinary number of priests among the organizers of the troubles, but also a fair sprinkling of men drawn from the governing classes. Two local squires were deeply implicated in the disturbances at Bury, a knight, bearing the honoured name of Roger Bacon, directed the sack of Yarmouth, another, Sir Thomas Cornerd, is recorded as having gone about levying blackmail at the head of a band. In addition, members of well-known county families of Norfolk and Suffolk, such as Richard and John Talmache, James Bedingfield, Thomas de Menchensey, Thomas Gissing, William Lacy, are found taking an active part in deeds of murder and pillage.

At that time there was a submerged tenth just as there is to-day. Mr. Oman calls them "hangers-on to the skirts of trade." There was also as great a dislike to foreigners then as there is now, only the dislike was directed against a richer class. It was believed that the Jews were secretly exporting all the gold and silver. The Flemings and Zeelanders who had come to Norfolk were also the object of attack.

Every journeyman or casually employed labourer in the wide branches of the wool trade who chanced to be out of work, put the blame of his privations on the outlander, whose competition had straitened the demand for native hands. Hence came the sudden fury displayed against the Flemings. It was, no doubt, partly inspired by unreasoning dislike for all strangers, but mainly rested on the economic fallacies that are always rife in an uneducated class living on the edge of starvation.

Mr. Oman has written his account without prejudice, and its value, we imagine, lies less in any thesis it may be thought to establish, than in the picture it gives of England in 1381. We find, then as always, a portion of humanity actuated by many different and conflicting motives, classes really aggrieved and classes that thought they were aggrieved, the whole striving and struggling towards that civilisation which seemed to march so slowly in those times. The historian establishes the fact that the rebellion was not immediately fatal to the manorial system, but it sowed the seeds of changes that were gradually to transform English husbandry.

OUR BUFFER STATE

Afghanistan. By ANGUS HAMILTON. (Heinemann, 25s. net.)

It is extraordinary how few adequate books there are on the subject of a state so important to Great Britain as Afghanistan. Mr. Hamilton's book, therefore, which is a mine of information on everything, from politics to botany, will be welcomed. The author visited Central Asia on his return from the war in Manchuria, and wandered about collecting information until his travels were cut short by an attack of small-pox, contracted from the natives in the region of the Pamirs. Mr. Hamilton's book on Korea will be remembered by all who are interested in the Far East, and they will be glad to find from the present work that his illness has not affected his powers of description and observation.

The book is profusely illustrated with photographs, but is in no sense a book to be read in an arm-chair: it is full of statistics and facts, not easily obtained. It is not, and does not pretend to be, entertaining, like Dr. Gray's "My residence at the Court of the Amir," and it is, moreover, of great weight avoirdupois. If the author has erred at all, he has erred in not restricting himself to his subject; but Afghanistan cannot be considered by itself, and we are ready for that reason to forgive him, if not, also, because we are always glad to read of such romantic places as Bokhara and Samarkand. Most of us have a desire, which for financial reasons will never be gratified, to visit those places, and Mr. Hamilton only increases that wish.

Listen to the traveller, how he tempts the readers into breaking the tenth commandment :

There is, indeed, a very special type found in the bazaars of Bokhara and Samarkand. Dressed in the choicest of silks, so soft that it suggests the rustle of the wind through the peach trees and dyed in tones of yellow, green, and brown, in shades of magenta and purple, in a note of blue reflecting the sky or touched with the blush of a red rose, are men of fine stature. They move with their long-skirted gowns clasped at the waist and their silken trousers tucked into brown, untanned boots, the seams of which are delicately embroidered. Every individual reserves to himself a most exclusive manner, representing the embodiment of dignity.

Later, his photographs and descriptions of scenes in Kabul and Kandahar only make us more envious, although it is not from the globe-trotter's point of view that the book is most interesting.

It may be doubted whether the great struggle on the frontier will be witnessed by the present generation, but doubts cannot diminish the importance of the problem or of Mr. Hamilton's warnings. There is one phase of the situation in Central Asia which is too constantly ignored in England, a phase which is brought out very distinctly in this book. It has been stated by some that, as the result of the recent war, the Mahomedan attitude towards Russian rule in Mid-Asia has been changed; and very closely connected with this theory is the comfortable conceit which "inspires Anglo-Indians to regard British administration of native races as heaven-born." It is not a pleasant subject at the present time, but the time is all the more reasonable for a reminder that the Russians are no less careful of the several peoples that find refuge under their rule than are our own authorities. Mr. Hamilton gives, in addition to a general survey of the country, a clear and adequate account of Anglo-Afghan relations. The various recent negotiations and missions are well explained, and, in spite of the record of many blunders and rebuffs, they are very interesting. Oriental language always casts an air of comedy over the most serious matters, and makes English seem, after all, a barren tongue. The documents from the "exalted British Parliament" are poor reading compared with the effusions of the Amir and his late father, "who has found mercy, may God enlighten his tomb!" and we commend the following story to certain of our rulers who are too humanitarian in their ideas. A letter from the Russian government had been read at a durbar, and the Amir asked for opinions about it, whereupon one Ali Yar Khan remarked: "Let this Turki dog who carries messages for infidels be beaten on the head with shoes till his hair falls off. That ought to be our answer to the Russians." The tale illustrates the methods of the very old school of diplomacy: the sequel is a curious example of the mixture of the old and the new schools. The Amir, greatly displeased at the remark, observed that, if there were any shoe-beating, it would be upon him who suggested the maltreatment of the messenger. Subsequently fifty rupees were given to the Russian courier.

FANCY AND FACT

Mendicant Rhymes. By LAURENCE HOUSMAN. (The Essex House Press.)

It is a pleasure to handle and to read this book, because it is printed and produced by the Essex House Press—a slim quarto with a white vellum back, printed in the elaborate ornamental type, very thick and black and handsome, which seems to give dignity to anything that appears in it. It is not an easy type to read; there are too many tails and twirls and flourishes for that; but each letter in itself is a thing of some beauty, and the whole effect of it on the page is impressive. We notice, by the way, a curious misprint on p. 10, where we have ronnd, for round; curious because one of the good points about the Essex House Press type is that its n is not, as with the ordinary fount, almost exactly an n turned upside down, and so the mistake is not as easily made and passed over as in other cases. We have heard a rumour that this Press means to give up work—a rumour which we wish may be unfounded since it holds its own position among the modern producers of artistic printing.

But to the poems. Mr. Housman is an artist in words as his printers are in letters:

And swift, and swift, from dale to hill,
Now hidden close, now clear to view,
On drives and strives the chace, and still
The huntress heart goes too;

There is no denying the verbal accomplishment of such a stanza, nor, again, of such verses as this:

There has been singing to-day
In the fall of the leaves;
Under a sky grown grey
For an earth that grieves;
Here where the autumn falls
Like a weary thing,
The voice of the bird as it calls
Is the voice of spring!

Continually throughout the book we find words cleverly and sympathetically used, as by one who loves them, to do more than to express a mood; to represent it—to convey by their very sound and relation the feeling that filled the poet's mind when he conceived the poems. This is something more, of course, than the mere onomatopœic arrangement of metre and rhythm; it is of the essence of poetry; and the name of poet cannot be denied to Mr. Housman when he writes such verses as we have quoted, or this poem called "r685":

Over the hill as I came down,
Across the flats where the peewits cry
I heard the drums through all the town
Beat for the men that were to die.

Oh, blithely up the eastern street
Looked in with me the morning sun,
Up to the market-square where fest
Went marching all like one.

And dark against the high town-hall
The shadow of the shambles fell;
And clear beneath its gilded ball
The town clock tolled their knell.

Came murmurs of the distant farms,
But from the townfolk not a cry,
Though wives with babes upon their arms
Stared, and stood waiting by!

Oh, oft I come and oft I go,
And see those roofs against the sky:—
But not the place I used to know
Where simple hearts beat high.

Now like a wreck each homestead looks,
While on it sunlight falls in flood:
And all the peewits by the brooks
Are crying out of wasted blood!

It is a strange thing that a poet who can use words so, can also use them so feebly as Mr. Housman sometimes permits himself to do.

Nothing is wrong to the eye,
Nothing is wrong to the ear . . .
Heaven was aware of his worth.

These are three lines from one poem, and all three badly even judged by the only standard we have yet applied to Mr. Housman's work. And as for Carriest destruction of domestic rest,

(said of the cuckoo) it is the worst line we have seen for some time.

The management of words is not the whole of poetry: dainty presentation of moods, even when the language is perfect, leaves a man, after all, but a very "minor" poet, if he has nothing more to tell us. To say that is not to ask for didactic poetry, poetry with a message, a philosophy, a "purpose"; it is to ask for the expression through poetry of a mental force which impresses, whether the poet intended to announce a doctrine or merely to record a mood.

The most exquisite poem leaves the reader cold unless the poet felt deeply or thought strenuously on the content. And, delicate and charming as are many of Mr. Housman's lyrics in this volume, they continue to convey the impression that they are merely fancies, half-realised and half-mastered thoughts and emotions, lacking strength and vividness. In other words, we are not persuaded of the conviction of the author. Here are some lines from a poem on gypsies:

Ah, give to me the sturdy soul
Which ten commandments can't control!
Which tracks, whatever man may say,
Its old primæval right of way,
Unpricked by conscience as by awe,
Through prohibitions of the law:
So to the whole world spreads a snare
And takes pot-luck of stream and air.
With never a dull day nor a doubt,
With fingers skilled to tickle trout,
With tongue to ply the trapper's trade,
And wit to cozen man and maid;
Which, proud, goes quit of foolish shame;
Loves freedom, but will, all the same,
Risk liberty to play the game;
And, where walls hold, and gates are barred
Does cheerfully its "three months hard."

Though not perfect, and marred by one fault of taste, that has its charm; but does Mr. Housman mean it? If he meant it, would he have expressed it like that? And would a poet who "really" meant it, have been able to write certain of the poems in this volume: "Easter Dawn," for instance, or "Knapton Church Roof," or, especially, "Pax Britannica"? We believe not; and it is that suspicion of incomplete sincerity, of readiness to accept a fancy for a thought or an emotion, of the poet's striving to appear other than he is and contradicting himself in the attempt, that sends us disappointed away from a book that is, in many respects, delightful.

THE METHOD OF SCIENCE

Lectures on the Method of Science. Edited by T. B. STRONG, Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 7s. 6d.)

FEW persons realise at all adequately the importance to human progress of the death of the individual human. Yet, much as each generation of men can and does convey of instruction to its successor, the gain secured to humanity by its deliverance from the weight of prescription, tradition and chilling monition vastly outweighs any loss of further patriarchal advice. It is to be regretted that no means has yet been discovered for the extinction of outworn reputations. Schools, Colleges, Universities—business firms and professional men—are constantly endowed with a fame, fair or evil, that is antiquated and untrue. The facile railer against the public schools of England and her ancient Universities, is invariably either an ancient alumnus unacquainted with the truth of to-day or a callow student who has not yet travelled outside his own departmental interests.

To distribute knowledge, to stimulate intellectual life, by personal association to excite interest and correlate separate studies, was the glory of Paris and Padua, Oxford and Cambridge in a former age. And those who know Oxford and Cambridge as they really are to-day know that these ends are still fulfilled, perhaps better than ever. How the work is done may be gathered from the volume before us. Here are brought together a number of lectures given during the summer meeting last year of Oxford University Extension students. They supply a valuable foundation on which to raise a substantial structure of modern knowledge, and any readers, who will, can thus orientate their thoughts in accordance with the educated opinion of to-day.

For this purpose, perhaps, the two lectures by the President of Corpus and by Professor Gotch are the most important. Professor Case analyses the various methods by which man reasons. He makes it clear that, if Bacon first put plainly before men the advantages of the empirical method, yet men had followed that method long before. He shows that the scientific method is not of one type, but includes, besides four distinguishable kinds of reasoning, a mixed method combining these kinds variously. He adds a much needed criticism of the fashionable doubt that truth cannot be known because we cannot compare the known and unknown together. Professor Gotch, in a lecture that will probably find a readier reception, traces the inevitable characteristics of scientific method by discussing the adverse criticisms that have been levelled at it, e.g., the freedom of its thought and its sceptical character, its recognition of reason as the only ultimate authority, its investigation of narrow details, its inferences from the known to the unknown, its use of the imagination. Much curious and entertaining information illustrates these topics. Examples are given of the vulgar errors about natural phenomena which the Royal Society had at first to investigate, and one may be here cited. It was believed:

that the elephant bath no joints, wherefore being unable to lie down he sleepeth against a tree, which the hunters observing do saw almost asunder, whereon the beast relying, by the fall of the tree falls down itself and is able to rise no more.

Our Professor is not only amusing here but suggestive. We are led to reflect how earlier generations can have formulated such strange beliefs, to observe what a multitude of such notions have, unexamined, been consigned to the limbo of forgotten curiosities, and to wonder whether any truth has thus been thrown away. Astrology, for instance, has never been refuted: it has been rejected by most thinking minds: but the example of the late Dr. Richard Garnett raises the doubt whether this rejection is not really a credulity.

Another reflection, suggested by this lecture and two others—by Mr. W. McDougall on Psycho-Physical Method and by the Linacre Professor on Inheritance in Animals and Plants—is that the mere recording of facts, especially of cognate facts, may be a valuable work, if not immediately, yet to later workers. The strenuous man of practical life who despises “useless learning,” is an infanticide: it is impossible to pronounce beforehand that any study may not be the means of achieving the next conquest of Nature. The discovery of argon came from the reinterpretation of a long observed variation in the weight of nitrogen: French engineers have been before us in improving their lighthouses with the help of “useless” investigations by the exactest methods into the action-time of stimulus upon visual sensation. If those with leisure could be persuaded to work at the collection of facts in any one of a hundred fields which our Universities could suggest to them, if our busy workers could devote their leisure hours to such collection, life would be richer to them and more enjoyable, and England would soon distance her competitors in every department of knowledge and commerce.

Professor Gotch observes that “even in the present day it is astonishing how many current beliefs exist in regard to natural phenomena which have little or no foundation in fact,” adding that “instances of such vulgar errors are familiar to us all.” It is certainly surprising to find how persistent is the belief that sunlight extinguishes a fire: less common, but not unknown, is the belief that lamp-light has the same power. When the Professor discusses why Sir William Temple argued so bitterly and blindly against Harvey’s doctrine of the circulation of the blood, he indicates faults of temper and reasoning dangerously prevalent to-day both in religious matters and in political. He quotes again Tyndall’s remark on the opposition of many clergymen to science:

The leaning towards belief in scientific truth is probably as strong in them as in other men, only the resistance to the bent is stronger; they do not lack the positive element, the love of truth, but the negative element, the fear of error predominates

He rightly declares that this is “a familiar form of skirking personal intellectual responsibility.” Here the Dean of Christ Church intervenes in a lecture on Scientific Method as applied to History to point the moral. He tears to tatters the agnostic criticism so often solemnly enunciated that “what could not be proved in the law-courts is probably unsound historically.” He points out what is evident on reflection to every one that history, unlike the physical sciences, deals with facts, each of which is unique, not potentially independent of particular time and place. He shows how necessary for the historic judgment is the fullest knowledge of the environment in which each fact occurs, and distinguishes belief from acquiescence in a historical statement. In his peroration he insists that we must “make our venture,” however true it may be that we shall make mistakes, and declares:

on the whole it is probably true that men do not, except for motives which are more or less calculable or transparent, aim at deceiving their fellows. And if you ask why we should believe any statement which we cannot verify, it appears to me that you must fall back on this fact . . . another form of the solidarity of mankind. . . . On the whole the race has an instinct for, as well as an interest in, truth, which we can trust, not credulously or irrationally, but reasonably and carefully.

One difficulty which often presents itself to immature thinkers is passed over by all the lecturers, although Professor Gotch in one passage develops an argument which is likely to suggest the difficulty. We have mentioned how he refers to Sir William Temple’s attack on Harvey. As a final argument Temple gave that the “sense” of mankind was against the theory that blood circulated through the body. Our Professor analyses this appeal, and finds rightly that it implies “a general consensus of opinion based upon either the current belief of the majority of mankind or upon apparently uniform sensory experience.” Following Joseph Glanville, he then shows how misleading sensory experience often is, and how “even its uniformity does not warrant its being the foundation for general statements as to natural phenomena.” The untrained student often wonders why if this is sound—and that it is sound we may regard as axiomatic—the uniform experience of men that they have an “ego,” and free will, is more to be relied on. “Non omnia possumus omnes,” especially in a short lecture: but it would have been useful if even a footnote had explained that in the study of natural phenomena the disagreement is between the senses assisted or unassisted by mechanical appliances and the reflective reason: in metaphysics the senses, whether so assisted or not, can have no final voice.

A lecture on the Evolution of Currency and Coinage may be commended to beginners in the study of bimetallicism, and another on Inheritance in Animals and Plants is of interest for the remarkable analogy it is able to exhibit between the relations of father and child and those of a first and second throw with dice. But perhaps the most astonishing discovery for those who can follow its achievement is that of the elements of the Double Star β Lyrae by Myers in 1898. Dr. Fison not only tells this story, but presents us with the current theories on the origin of the solar system and of the Moon.

Professor Flinders Petrie lectures on Archaeological Evidence, and, although in the enthusiasm of his study he speaks somewhat roundly so that Dean Strong finds it desirable to append a caveat, yet he says much that is useful and, to those who are not experts, novel. He does not display the philosophic temper of the Dean, however, and his style does not boggle at “dependable” and other innovations. Except for this, the reader will find pleasure and profit in the whole volume. One more quotation may conclude this notice. Professor Gotch in emphasising the importance of imagination to the scientific student resorts appropriately enough to a graceful and striking image. “Imagination,” he says, “is the rider on the white horse; there is given unto him a crown, and he rides forth conquering and to conquer.”

AFTERWARDS

How often, dearest, have we trod
The ways of this green earth together,
Taking them for the ways of God
Which change not with the time and weather;
But change comes not to us alone:
The high woods fade with sadder meaning,
Pathetic grows the vivid tone
Of spring's quick uplands heavenward leaning.

Since I, companionless, have fared
Where hill-crest lured, or white road beckon'd,
The ampler prospect, now unshared,
Gave pause for which I had not reckon'd:
Earth's verdurous disc in heaven's embrace—
The calm survey of faëry distance
Responsive to an absent face,
On dual pathos made insistence.

No more the siren brook detains,
With meadowy lilt, my feet to linger:
Through memory-haunted paths and lanes
I follow memory's ghostly finger,
Nor halt where pathless downs divide
The dales of dusk from sunset heather.
God's morrow, maybe, side by side
Again, we'll pace the ways together.

EASTWOOD KIDSON.

MR. BENSON'S PATER

IN no other country has mediocrity such a chance as in England. The second-rate writer, the second-rate painter meet with an almost universal and immediate recognition, and when good mediocrities die, if they do not go straight to heaven (from a country where the existence of Purgatory is denied by Act of Parliament), at least they run a very fair chance of burial in Westminster Abbey. De mortuis nil nisi bonus, in the shape of royalties, is the real test by which we estimate the authors who have just passed away. A few of our great writers—Ruskin and Tennyson for example—have enjoyed the applause accorded to senility by a people usually timid of brilliancy and strength, when it is contemporary, because the ruins of mental faculties touch our imagination, owing perhaps to that tenderness for antiquity which has preserved for us the remains of Tintern Abbey. Seldom, however, does a great writer live to find himself in the prime of his literary existence a component part of English literature. Yet there are happy exceptions, and not the least of these was Walter Pater.

His inclusion in the English Men of Letters series, so soon after his death, has somewhat dazzled the reviewers. Mr. Benson has been complimented on a daring, which, if grudgingly endorsed, is treated as just the sort of innovation you would expect from the brother of the author of "Dodo." "To a small soul the age which has borne it can appear only an age of small souls," says Mr. Swinburne, and the presence of Pater, which rose so strangely beside our waters, seemed to many of his contemporaries only the last sob of a literature which they sincerely believed had come to an end with Lord Macaulay.

It was a fortunate chance by which Mr. A. C. Benson, one of our more discerning critics, himself master of no mean style, should have been chosen as commentator of Pater. Among the Plutarchocracy of the present day a not very pretty habit prevails of holding a sort of inquest on deceased writers—a reaction against misplaced eulogy—tearing them and their works to pieces and leaving nothing for reviewers or posterity to dissipate. From the author of the "Upton Letters" we expect sympathy and critical acumen, and it is needless to say we are never disappointed. The book itself is not merely about a literary man: it is a work of literature itself. So it is charming to disagree with Mr. Benson sometimes and a triumph to find him tripping. You experience the pleasure of the University Extension Lecturer pointing out the mistakes in Shakespeare's geography, the joy of the schoolboy when the master has made a false quantity. In marking the modern discoveries which have shattered, not the value of Pater's criticism, but the authenticity of pictures round which he wove his aureoles of prose, Mr. Benson says: "In the essay on Botticelli he is on firmer ground." But among the first masterpieces winged by the sportsmen of the new criticism was the Hamilton Palace Assumption of the Virgin (now proved to be by Botticini) to which Pater makes one of his elusive and delightful allusions; while "The School of Giorgione," which Mr. Benson thinks a little passé in the light of modern research, is now in the movement. The latest bulletins of Giorgione, Pater would have been delighted to hear, are highly satisfactory. Pictures once torn from the altars of authenticity are being reinstated under the acolytage of Mr. Herbert Cook. A curious and perhaps wilful error, too, has escaped Mr. Benson's notice. Referring to the tomb of Cardinal Jacopo at San Miniato, Pater says, "insignis formâ fui—his epitaph dares to say." The inscription reads fuit. But perhaps the t was added by the Italian Government out of deference to the English residents in Florence and the word read fui in 1871. Troja fuit might be written all over Florence.

Then some of the architecture at Vezelay "typical of Cluniac sculpture" is pure Viollet-le-Duc, I am assured by a competent authority. A more serious error, for it is an adjective not a fact, occurs in "Apollo in Picardy"—"rebellious masses of black hair." This is the only instance in the parfait prosateur, as Bourge called him, of a cliché worthy of Rita. Then it is possible to differ from Mr. Benson in his criticism of the "Imaginary Portraits" (the four fair ovals in one volume), surely Pater's most exquisite achievement after the "Renaissance." "Gaston" is the failure Pater thought it was, and "Emerald Uthwart" is frankly very silly, though Mr. Benson has a curious tenderness for it. One sentence he abandons as absolute folly. The grave psychological error in the story occurs where the surgeon expresses compunction at making the autopsy on Uthwart because of his perfect anatomy. Surely this would have been a source of technical pleasure and interest to a surgeon, much as a butterfly collector is pleased when he has murdered an unusually fine species of lepidoptera. Speaking myself as a vivisector of some experience, I can confidently affirm that a well-bred golden colley is far more interesting to operate upon than a mongrel sheep dog. Nor can I comprehend Mr. Benson's blame of Denys l'Auxerrois as too extravagant and even unwholesome, when the last quality, so obvious in Uthwart, he seems to condone.

Again, "Marius the Epicurean" is a failure by Pater's own high standard: you would have imagined it seemed so to Mr. Benson. Dulness is by no means its least fault. In scheme it is not unlike "John Inglesant"; but how lifeless are the characters compared with those of Shorthouse! Both books deal with philosophic ideas and sensations; the incidents are merely illustrative, and there is hardly a pretence of sequence. In the historical panorama which moves behind Inglesant, there are at least "tactile" values, and seventeenth-century England is conjured up in a wonderful way, how accurately I do not know. In "Marius" the background is merely a backcloth for mental poses plastiques. You wonder, not how still the performers are, but why they do not move at all. Marcus Aurelius, the delightful Lucian, even Flavian, and the rest, are busts from the Capitoline and Naples museums. Their bodies are make-believe, or straw from the loft at White Nights. Cornelius, Mr. Benson sorrowfully admits, is a Christian prig, but Marius is only a pagan chip from the same block. John Inglesant is a prig too; but there is blood in his veins, and you get, at all events, a Vandyke, not a plaster cast. The magnificent passages of prose which vest this image make it resemble the ex voto madonnas of continental churches—a shrine in literature but not a lighthouse.

I sometimes wonder what Pater would have become had he been a Cambridge man, and if the more strenuous University might have forced him into greater sympathy with modernity; or if he had been born in America, as he nearly was, and Harvard was to have acted as the benign stepmother of his days. Such speculations are not beyond all conjecture, as Sir Thomas Browne said. I think he would have been exactly the same. Oxford, I always maintain, is a condition not a place, and Pater is taken rightly as a type of all that is best in the gracious city, whispering for us the last enchantment of the middle age, far more even than its towers, at which Matthew Arnold, intellectually always in Cambridge, mocked in very reverence.

On the occasion of Pater's lecture on Prosper Mérimée, his friends gathered round the platform to congratulate him; he expressed a hope that the audience were able to hear what he said. "We overheard you," said Mr. Oscar Wilde. "Ah, you have a phrase for everything," replied the lecturer, whom the author of Lady Windermere's Fan declared with pathetic inaccuracy was the only contemporary who had ever influenced him. How admirable both of the criticisms! Pater is an aside in literature, and that is why he was sometimes overlooked, and may be so again in ages to come. Though he is the greatest master of style the century produced, he can never be regarded as part of the structure of English prose. He is rather one of the ornaments, which often last long after the structure has perished. His place will be shifted, as fashions change; like some exquisite piece of eighteenth-century furniture perchance he may be forgotten in the attics of literature awhile, only to be rediscovered. And as Fuseli said of Blake: "He will be damned good to steal from." If he uses words as though they were pigments and sentences like vestments at the Mass, it is not only the ritualistic cadence of his harmonies which makes his works imperishable, but the ideas which they symbolise as well. Pater thinks beautifully always; about things which some people do not think altogether beautiful, perhaps, and sometimes he thinks aloud. We overhear him and feel almost the shame of the eavesdropper.

Mr. Benson has approached Walter Pater, the man, with almost sacerdotal deference. He suggests ingeniously where you can find the self-revelation in "Gaston" and "The Child in the House." This is far more illuminating than the recollections of personal friends whose memoirs are modelled on those of Captain Sumph. Mr. Humphry Ward remembers Pater only once being angry. It was in the Common room. It was with X, an elderly man! The subject of the difference was modern lectures. "Relations between them were afterwards strained." Mr. Arthur Symonds remembers that he intended to bring out a new volume of "Imaginary Portraits." Fancy that! And Mr. Ainslie, that Raymond of Toulouse, has another possible subject. Really, when friends begin to tell stories of that kind, I begin to suspect they are trying to conceal something. Perhaps we have no right to know everything or anything about the amazing personalities of literature. But Henleys and Purcells lurk and leak out even at Oxford, and that is not the way to silence them. Just when the aureole is ready to be fitted on, some horrid graduate (Litteræ inhumaniores) inks the statue. Anticipating something of the kind, Mr. Benson is careful to insist on the divergence between Rossetti and Pater, and on page 86 says something which is ludicrously untrue. If self-revelation can be traced in "Gaston," it can be found elsewhere. There are sentences in "Hippolytus veiled," the "Age of the Athletic Prizemen" and "Apollo in Picardy" which not only explode Mr. Benson's statement, but where the objections he urges against Denys l'Auxerrois might well be substantiated. They are passages where Pater thinks aloud. Rossetti wore the heart on the sleeve, no doubt, Pater up the sleeve; but it slips down occasionally in spite of the alb which drapes the hieratic writer not always discreetly.

ROBERT ROSS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

A FAVOURITE EPITHET OF WORDSWORTH'S

"WORDSWORTH," observed the late Mr. R. H. Hutton in an aphoristic sentence, "drew uncommon delights from very common things." But, more than this, the very word common had a charm for him similar to that which an adjective of such sumptuous import as rich would possess for a nature like that of Keats. In "The Prelude" and "The Recluse" alone the word occurs some twenty-five times as an adjective, and its cognate verb and noun forms—commune, communion, community and commonally—are not unfrequent. It is to be found repeatedly in his shorter poems, upon which much of his fame depends.

Only in "The Excursion" is it rarely used, where less than half a dozen instances of it are found.

The word common is suggestive to many people of a slightly depreciatory sense, which, undoubtedly, it is often intended to convey; but a glance at a good dictionary reveals a term of real etymological interest, expressing many different shades of meaning. Thus, e.g., the Latin origin of the word cum and munis = serving (others) together (with oneself) and its opposite proprius = what is one's own, can both be illustrated from Wordsworth's poetry:

If the wind do but stir for his proper delight . . .
The common life our Nature breeds.

It is not difficult to see why Wordsworth should have employed the epithet common so frequently in "The Prelude." In the building up of the Poet's mind and moral nature, which is the main subject of that poem, the sense of a community bore a large part.

There was, first, the dim and undefined sense of a community with Nature, felt in boyhood and more intensely realised in youth and opening manhood; there was the outward embodiment of a primitive community in the simple and manly lives led by the Cumbrian dalesmen; and, last, there was the sense of a wider and deeper community, embracing whole classes of individual men and nations, of which the initial stages of the French Revolution gave a hope. As regards the shorter poems generally, it may be said that those pieces in which the word occurs lend a special weight of meaning to Wordsworth's expressed view of the true functions of a poet:

In common things that round us lie
Some random truths he can impart;
The harvest of a quiet eye
That broods and sleeps on his own heart.

The comparison of a large number of passages in which the word occurs shows that it is applied to the mental and moral qualities and attributes of man, and to the various objects summed up in the line:

The outward shows of sky and earth

Though frequently used in the sense of ordinary, as, e.g.,

This is no common waste, no common gloom,

the context will be found to give it a lustre and a suggestion of hidden meaning that exclude any idea of depreciation, as in the passage from "Hart Leap Well" from which the above is quoted, where poet and untutored shepherd, meeting together on a lone hillside, are united in soul by a gush of sympathy for the wrongs and sufferings of the mute animal kingdom.

This heightening effect of a context is better exhibited in the beautiful lyric, "To a Highland Girl," in which the line:

Though but of common neighbourhood is made to express the devotion of a spiritual homage to simple and rustic beauty.

What tenderness and simplicity in lines like these!

And in the meadows and the lower grounds
Was all the sweetness of a common dawn—from the sunrise scene witnessed during a walk home across the hills in the dawn after a country dance:

. . . her common thoughts
Are piety—

from the impassioned description in the twelfth book of "The Prelude" of Mary Hutchinson, afterwards his wife:

A simple produce of the common day—from the sublime passage in "The Recluse" describing the result of the wedding of the human intellect and the "goodly universe":

The common face of Nature spake to me Rememberable things—

from the passage describing how in his childhood the expressiveness of Nature came home to him in sudden flashes:

Down would he sit; and without strength or power
Look at the common grass from hour to hour—from the "Stanzas" descriptive of himself and S. T. Coleridge:

The common creature of the brotherhood—descriptive of the feelings of sympathy which Wordsworth, on first settling in Grasmere, was prepared to show towards the humble dwellers in that Vale. These following lines are interesting from the juxtaposition of the two words common and ordinary:

Even then the common haunts of the green earth,
And ordinary interests of man,
Which they embosom—

from a passage in "The Prelude" tracing the progress from the love of Nature to the love of Man.

It is needless to remind readers of the mingled pathos and tenderness in that line from the great Ode:

And fade into the light of common day.

Instances might be multiplied; but enough has been said to show how an epithet (which, by the bye, Shakespeare used with effect) takes on "colour, intensity, and variety from the infection of neighbourhood." What Wordsworth in the last book of the "Prelude" calls:

A sense of exquisite regard For common things—

must have deepened his sense of the expressiveness of the adjective common, which accordingly we find him time after time applying to those objects with which, in his view, great and permanent poetry should always deal.

FICTION

The Queen's Tragedy. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. (Pitman 6s.)

WHATEVER else may be thought of Father Benson's latest historical novel, no one will fail to find it fresh, suggestive and interesting. It keeps one asking: Is this true? Was that wisely done? Which was the right course in those circumstances? Such questionings mean that the book both holds attention, and stimulates the mind. To speak of the fiction, as distinct from the history, is really impossible, for the two are interwoven like warp and woof. So I address myself to the latter at once. Different as the judgments of Protestants and Catholics have been about Queen Mary, all agree that her reign closed in disappointment. Even before the worst had arrived, Father Benson describes her feelings thus:

Eighteen months ago she had been so happy. The Legate had come with a splendour that promised great things; England, she thought, had been restored to unity; her husband had been with her; the babe had leapt in her womb—the dear babe that was to take up the government, when she laid it down. Now it seemed as if all were a ghastly delusion. The Legate indeed still here, but how powerless. The heart-shaking scene in Westminster Hall was no more than the rehearsing of a play that seemed postponed indefinitely. Her husband had disappeared into silence, and the leap of the child was a thrill of a horrible disease. . . . She had begun by hoping that . . . restoring little by little the old worship, the light of Faith would be re-kindled. And her people had answered by attacking her priests, mocking her religion, and weaving sedition and heresy so inextricably together, that it was impossible to punish the one without glorifying the other.

That is graphically as well as truly and sympathetically put. In Mary we see good intentions and mistaken policy tending to failure, and failing; while on the other side stands Elizabeth, worldly wise and unscrupulous, knowing that she will win, and winning. In conclusion Mary's star sets in gloom, while the courtiers almost to a man, slip away to worship the rising sun. The main interest, therefore, and the chief problems are connected with Mary, but there is also a romantic element. Guy Manton, a Cambridge Master of Arts, is introduced, an unconventional but interesting character, whose development shows us what Father Benson thinks would have been the line taken during those troubles by one "of Catholic character." He is human, of course, and we see in him the degrading effect of the burnings. Having watched them, he becomes, as he himself confesses, "a hard devil." The obsession is admirably described with all the power of psychological and religious analysis in which Father Benson excels. The narrative too, here reaches a high degree of excellence. Manton's fidelity is put to a dramatic test, and he wavers; in the end, however, his better nature conquers. But, as was said before, the true interest of the book lies in pure history. And what of that history? To me it seems that in its main outlines it is unimpeachable. The trials, the successes and failures of the historical characters correspond with what actually took place. For the rest, the author has attained that degree of vraisemblance, which is to be expected in a historical novel. As we descend to details, however, we note the points at which differences of opinion will begin to assert themselves. Extremists will, of course, never be fully satisfied. The admirers of Foxe, though they will find some things to their liking, will not find enough. Believers in the inspiration of Nicholas Sander will not relish the way in which Latimer and his compères are praised "for as much as they did wisely." Enthusiasts for Elizabeth, and they are many, will say that her portrait has been too darkly drawn. But for my own part I think that a more notable error is one bearing hardly on Queen Mary. As for Elizabeth, though no one would assert nowadays that she was truthful, yet on the other hand no evidence is forthcoming to prove her such an unblushing hypocrite and traitor to her sister, as she is here represented to have been. This is true, I think; and yet Father Benson does not seem to me to have here exceeded the licence always allowed in a historical novel. For, as soon as he looked beyond Mary's reign, and considered the contrast between Elizabeth's conduct before and after its termination—and perhaps pondered the wording of the coronation oath, which she took in the hands of the old Catholic prelates when she had fully decided on the measures for the overthrow of the old religion—he would feel fully justified in attributing to her as much as he has done of trickery and of faithlessness. But however this may be, I pass to a more important question: Is the Mary Tudor of this novel correctly drawn from life? She is here a "stupid woman," "conscious of her lack of wit and gaiety," "unable to win love and affection," and she is constantly losing herself in dreams. Her "man's voice" and prematurely aged appearance are insisted upon in and out of season. I do not think that this is good portraiture.

It was, perhaps, true of her last days, when the blood-letting and the other barbarities of contemporary leechcraft had brought her down to a shadow of her former self. But this was not the woman who has made her mark on our history. The despatches of the ambassadors, who came into actual contact with her, show that she was active, matter-of-fact, well informed, queenly, and gifted with great insight into the men and matters that came under her notice. It may be regretted that Father Benson's story concerns itself with the gloomy part of her reign exclusively. Even if otherwise faultless, a picture so drawn is bound to be somewhat one-sided. Of course, there are also smaller points, which might be discussed, if space allowed. He seems to me to be too hard upon Philip, too favourable to Pole, and to underestimate Mary's dislike of her half-sister, which so good an authority as a Venetian ambassador has called "hatred." When Elizabeth's life was in the balance, it was saved by Philip's intervention. This would hardly fit in with some of Father Benson's most striking scenes. Whatever may be the objective truth about the points I have criticised, it is clear first that they will not affect the "The Queen's Tragedy," except in details which are non-essential, and secondly, that Father Benson has been so much on his guard against showing too much partiality for his co-religionists, that, when he does err, it is generally to their disadvantage.

J. H. POLLEN, S. J.

Red Records. By ALICE PERRIN. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

MRS. PERRIN knows well how to tell a gruesome story, and all the stories in this book are tales of horror. "In this world the strongest of all things is fate" is a proverb of Hindustan which has been aptly taken as the book's motto, and is in absolute accord with the whole book's tenour. Fate is the power, pitiless and relentless, which holds men in its grip, struggling little or long till they are dead and dust. What of the power that makes the birds sing and the sun shine; what of the power that is at times in ourselves to recognise and respond to the beauty? Fate is the easiest solution of the eternal problem, and for that reason the least satisfactory. And it is because the idea of Fate is so insistent in these stories that, somehow, they lose much of their horror and their strength: they are deprived of vitality by it, in the same way as a man is robbed of vitality by the predominance of the Fate-theory in any form; and vitality is the finest thing a man or a piece of work can possess. But the stories are all (with the exception of "The Musk Pod") of a high standard, for Mrs. Perrin, as was apparent in her "East of Suez," has the power of vivid description in an unusual degree and has mastered the technique of a short story. Those that deal directly with the natives of India are much the best: it is necessary to go to Kipling to find better work of that kind than "The Evil Eye."

Where Two Worlds Met. By SYDNEY PHELPS and BRIDEY M. O'REILLY. (Griffiths, 6s.)

THE exchange of souls is an ambitious theme for a novelist. Théophile Gautier has shown how the subject may be treated in the form of a short story, but the authors of "Where Two Worlds Met" have boldly adopted it as the main-spring of a romance of some two hundred and fifty pages. In the case of Gautier, the love-sick youth is made to exchange his outward appearance for that of the husband of the woman he loves: in the present instance, the unscrupulous lover, Lysaght, by dint of a strong will and an unholy knowledge of black magic, transposes the soul of the girl, Nualla, into his own body and himself returns to the bosom of her family in the outward semblance of his victim. Of Nualla's experiences on the border-line between two worlds we are given a vivid picture, and the description of the marvellous vision vouchsafed her of her tormentor's sufferings and eventual repentance, through which she is enabled to re-enter her own body and complete her life on earth, is a fine piece of writing. The whole tale is weird and uncanny in the extreme. The scene is laid in Devon; not the Devon of romance, that kindly land of cakes and ale, but a country of silent pools and dark, dreary moorlands, where terrible heathen rites are performed by the light of the moon, and where grim spirits of evil reign supreme. The description of the powers that assist at the séances of Miss Tryphosa, an elderly dabbler in spiritualism, is enough to inspire a wholesome terror of that erratic instrument, planchette. We learn that it is controlled by "horrid little elementals," who fight wildly for the pencil, and who "are like nothing so much as a group of monkeys quarrelling over some prize"; and that the message purporting to come from the spirit of a blameless young man is, in reality, the invention of "a mass of shapeless red, from which looms the head of a particularly repulsive kind of puppy." There are some amusing old Devonshire worthies in the book, notably a certain Old Nance and her sworn foe, Mary Pierce. Their efforts to counteract each other's white magic, and their reconciliation, after a feud of sixty years standing, are well and sympathetically described. We understand that the book has received the Apostolic blessing of the Pope.

Latter Day Sweethearts. By MRS. BURTON HARRISON. (Unwin, 6s.)

MRS. HARRISON tells the story of two daughters of millionaires, from New York, and from Alabama, and their entangled love-affairs, and it is difficult to decide which is the more charming example of American girlhood. From the first day on board the Baltic, when the radiant Pamela Winstanley becomes the absorbing topic of conversation, and Helen Carstairs arouses the admiration of the discriminating few, the bright, clever story steadily advances in interest. It is not that the author has anything new to tell of love and lovers; many another novel has followed closely upon these lines, begun and ended in a visit to Europe; but the point of view is fresh, and the people are, with few exceptions, unusually agreeable acquaintance. A change in the ordinary type of millionaire will be welcomed; the attitude of nearly every one towards wealth as a desirable and convenient possession and nothing more strikes a pleasant note. Love is the cause and the cure of all the evils endured by these "latter day sweethearts," who, however, belong in sentiment quite as much to the day of Jacob and Rachel: even the impecunious English peer, the New York man of business and the practical French novelist are uninfluenced in their wooing by the dollars that would gild success. Mrs. Harrison has given proofs elsewhere of her deftness in the handling of moods and emotions, generally by elusive touches, by faint hints and suggestions, that sometimes impose too close a strain upon the attention of the reader for mere amusement. Here she is in holiday humour, less analytical, but not less skilful: her characters, natural to start with, are developed and modified by the force of circumstances in almost imperceptible degrees; yet essentially they never change, and never disappoint the reader, who parts from them with regret.

FINE ART

THE NEW DUDLEY GALLERY—THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

FEW painters of eminence have in recent years been attracted by the views of the high Alps and the Tyrol. The sharpness of the detail caused by the intense light, the brilliancy of the colour, which, when literally rendered, appears garish, have made moderns shy of the attempt. William Stott made some fine pastels, but I believe most of them were night effects which subordinate the details and allow of treatment in mass without much conscious simplification.

M. Simon Bussy, it is true, has occasionally been drawn to the decorative beauties of groups of pines against the intense gloom of green grass, and it is with his work that M. Augustin Rey has most in common among Western painters. But M. Bussy takes his subjects in a small area of vision and appropriately treats them on a small scale, whereas M. Rey delights in vast panoramas and treats them on a scale that is vast for water-colour. Such a description prepares one for the abominable chromolithographic style of fifty years ago, and M. Rey avoids this by the most consummate art and the most rigid selection. It is surprising to read in the preface to the catalogue of his exhibition at the New Dudley Gallery that the pictures were executed from beginning to end from nature, as every stroke would appear to have arrived as the quintessence of many studies and struggles. The Japanese artists are constantly called to mind, and it is notorious that the Japanese never painted their pictures from nature. It is, therefore, a tour de force on M. Rey's part to have maintained the simple scheme of flat tones and not to have allowed himself to be drawn aside by the accident of the moment. His use of black in the foliage of pines is wonderfully bold and skilful, as seen in The Great Shreckhorn and the Finsteraarhorn; Sunset, and Lake of Chavonne and Chamossaire, near Villars. Grindelwald and the Wetterhorn (Winter) is a grand scheme in cool greys and greens. This kind of art is apt to irritate from the very fact of its obvious learning and its eclectic spirit, and M. Rey is to be congratulated on his success in not giving any cause for irritation.

The collection of seascapes by Eugène Boudin at the Leicester Galleries is the finest that has been brought together in England. There is one drawback about this adorable painter, that he leaves the critic nothing to say. "Exquisite, adorable, charming," are mere notes of exclamation, yet closer analysis seems foolish and even a little cruel. I suppose we must admit that he was not a great painter, yet his work shows more than talent, if not exactly genius. Untaught instinct is the chief note in genius, and, with all his cleverness and wit, nothing could be more naïf, more instinctive and childlike than his art. In comparison with him, among his successors and co-workers, Monet seems dogmatic and theory-ridden, Sisley incompetent, Renoir a little insane, Pissarro dull. His art has the closest analogy with Corot in its sweetness and charm without weakness or indecision.

As with Corot, his best works are on a small scale. Anvers is exquisite, and, whilst it is quite personal and modern, there are passages, like the red roofs of the old town, that remind one of the glorious view of Delft by Van der Meer. Like all great colourists, Turner, Brabazon, Manet, he knows the value of grey and black, as shown in Le port de Trouville—le matin. La Plage de Trouville is dotted with the absurd and delicious crinolines that we see in the similar picture by Manet at Sully's. Camaret à marée basse—has any one since Turner noted with such perfect and spontaneous art the gleam of light in a distant town, and the foreground with the sails in shadow? And the Bateaux échoués à Portrieux, with its ineffable grey sky, Falaises à Etretat, Rotterdam. Vue du port d'Anvers, all are perfect, unapproachable, and, to come back to the first word, adorable.

Boudin is redeemed from the commonplace by sheer charm, the absence of which makes the work of Albert Lebourg in the same gallery quite uninteresting. The delftness of his handling, especially with the palette knife, is characteristically French, but national rather than individual. The gap that divides perfect art from mere competence and ability is curiously narrow, yet it is as infranchissable as if leagues separated them.

ROUND THE GALLERIES

FROM time to time we have had occasion to single out from current exhibitions the works of Mr. Evert Moll, and the promise shown in these isolated examples of his art is fulfilled by the collection of his oil paintings and water-colours at the Old Water-Colour Society's gallery. Having much in common with the Marises, Mauve and other modern masters of his own nation, Mr. Moll, nevertheless, is susceptible to foreign influence; and his Thunder Cloud—Isle of Wight (70) has much of the dignity and not a little of the quality of an Old Crome. In many of his slighter water-colour sketches—a medium whose purity he preserves better than do most of his countrymen—we are reminded now of Whistler, now of Brabazon, by the felicity of his pregnant touches, his economy of means and great delicacy of colour. As becomes a man of twenty-five, he seeks to learn from all the great masters, but he consistently makes his own observation of nature, and the strong personal feeling which pervades his varied exhibits is a sufficient proof that he is not a mere imitator of the qualities of others. Like Gabriel, he paints in a higher key than the older Dutchmen, is more occupied with truth to natural lighting, and is not limited to an appreciation of any one mood of nature. His handling of that difficult colour, scarlet, calls forth high praise, and he justifies his fascination with the red roofs of Holland by the gentle tenderness with which they are rendered. In some respects the most characteristic and original of his exhibits is My Garden (69), a view of his favourite red roofs across a canal with a bare tree in the centre of the foreground, a composition as successful as it is daring and having that unexpected balance which we associate with the masters of Japan. If he keep true to his ideals, Mr. Moll should go far; already his achievements are considerable.

An older generation of Dutch painters is represented at Messrs. Knoedler's galleries. In this collection De Bock is especially well represented by characteristic deep-toned landscapes, while good examples are also shown of Ter Meulen and Kever as well as of Neuhuys, J. Maris and other of the more famous masters of this popular school.

Admirers of Japanese art will find an unusually choice collection of colour-prints at Mr. W. B. Paterson's gallery. From the collector's standpoint probably the principal feature is a fine example of an exceedingly rare and famous triptych by Utamaro, a master who is splendidly represented in this collection; but examples of Harunobu, Hokkei, Yeishi, Utagawa, Koriussai, and Hokusai will excite scarcely less admiration, while Hiroshige, whose one defect—to collectors—is his modernity, is represented by some very beautiful landscapes as vivacious in arrangement as they are harmonious in colour.

Among many minor exhibitions now open mention must be made of a collection of dainty little impressions in water-colour by Sir William Eden—the Baronet to Whistler's Butterfly—at the Dutch Gallery, Grafton Street; while at the Doré Gallery is a collection of original drawings for Westminster cartoons by Sir F. Carruthers Gould, and water-colours of architectural and landscape subjects at home and abroad by Miss M. Dawkins.

From Cowper to Cosway, from Hilliard to Shelley or Smart, the present collection of miniatures at Messrs. Hodgkins's in Bond Street is an education in many styles of this particular branch of art. Apart from the interesting technical qualities which are here brought into acute juxtaposition, the historical value of many of the portraits of princes and queens, statesmen and nobles, is unusually great. For example, Peter Oliver gives us Frederick V., King of Bohemia, who married the only daughter of James I., and thus became grandfather of George I. This lady, Elizabeth of England, is also here, from the brush of the same master. She is wearing a décolleté bodice with pink rosettes and a large lace ruff, and looks quite capable of being the mother of the gifted Prince Rupert. From Samuel Cowper is a fine portrait of the first wife of James II., and, in fact, the Stuarts and their friends and enemies have a very large share of the pictures. Just how far the miniatures of any time were truthful it is impossible to say, but, judging by these one hundred and twenty examples, either they flattered very agreeably or the sitters of the sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth centuries were more beautiful than the people of to-day. Numbers 57 and 65 give portraits, each by John Smart, of Charles, Marquis Cornwallis, the first Governor-General of India. One is dated 1787, the other 1792. In both he wears powdered hair and a red uniform, but otherwise each is as unlike the other as well can be. Five years of the East may make a change, but this is a remarkable one. If one artist painting one man twice in so short a time makes him so different, can we wonder at, say, the diversities of the various eighteenth-century painters' portraits of Mrs. Robinson, or believe that a national portrait gallery brings us much nearer to our heroes? But, in any case, this collection is full of charm: if Princess Amelia by Plimer, or Engleheart's Lady Walpole are not not quite what those ladies really were, they are what we wish they might have been, and what they doubtless felt themselves to be, which, after all, helps to tell one side of their characters.

As we have said, almost every portrait in the gallery is historical, and to the student of the now once more fashionable art of miniature these examples are of infinite use. The small room containing Bartolozzi's studies and casual drawings is attractive, too. As a draughtsman the excellent and original engraver is not, however, seen to great advantage. There are some charming cupids holding festoons surrounding a rather poor drawing of the consort of George IV.; there is a fine pencil portrait of Lord Chancellor Loughborough, and a full-length portrait of a lady wearing a costume of the period; these and some few others are pleasant, but the collection, as a whole, will not add to the artist's fame.

MUSIC

READERS of Mr. Finck's Life of Wagner will open his little book on Grieg (Lane's "Living Masters of Music," 2s. 6d. net) with high expectations, and we do not think they will feel themselves sent empty away. The book is not a critical study; indeed, the author expressly disclaims the critic's function, which he thinks "a modern disease, a species of phylloxera threatening the works of genius." In this vein, therefore, the enumeration of Grieg's works (pp. 86-120) is accompanied by eulogies only. Even so, however, we must demur to the verdict on the Violin Sonata (op. 45) quoted on p. 98: "It must be classed with the most inspired scores ever written. . . . From beginning to end it is a marvel of inspiration, intelligence and independence." The work seems to us a representative one, rich in lyrical ideas of the most fascinating type, but showing Grieg's weakness equally with his strength—the continual repetition of phrases unchanged save for key; the continual iteration of two-bar phrases, sometimes contracted to one, sometimes expanded to four or even three, but never woven into a continuous web. The principal charm of the book lies in the atmosphere it provides. We see Grieg among his beloved fjords; among his friends; in his home; at the peasants' festivals; and the whole gives a new insight into the spirit of his work.

Mr. Finck again indulges his taste for critic-baiting, which is, perhaps, a pity. After all, we must attempt to classify our impressions; and if critics usually under-rate new authors, possibly some of Mr. Finck's own verdicts (e.g., p. 78) err on the other side. There is no use, however, in whining over the errors of critics. It is the penalty of genius to be despised and rejected: the world is made so. For genius is the channel for a new revelation of truth or beauty: if it is really new, the world is not prepared, and cannot understand it, and while it is learning the genius is misunderstood: if the message is not new, the world understands it, but the genius is no genius but shoddy.

Miss Hullah's little sketch of Leschetizky in the same series will be welcome to a large circle of readers. It is a good book of its kind, and trustworthy as a picture of the man, his ways, methods and surroundings: of this we have first-hand confirmation from one of his favourite pupils. A characteristic story is told of his visit to Nicholas I. of Russia, showing remarkable courage and self-reliance in a young man of twenty-two. Two chapters are devoted to the "Method," if such it can be called; though in truth Leschetizky is no slave of formulæ and speaks of himself as simply a doctor: "One pupil needs this, another that. . . . There can be no rule. I am a doctor" (p. 41). The method is more mental than physical, consisting largely in concentration on every detail, bar by bar. He does not advocate more than four, or at most five, hours practising a day—a sane limitation. The tendency is to put the screw on tighter and tighter, till we hear ghastly stories of players practising sixteen hours a day, leaving only time for a game of billiards and bed. Is this life? What shall a man be profited if he gain the whole world of fame and lose his own self or life? As Grieg says: ("Grieg," p. 122) "Virtuosity revenges itself!" After all, much as we admire strenuous work, art is made for man and not man for art. Both books are well got up; the portraits and illustrations are good; and the first contains a bibliography of Grieg literature and a list of his works to date.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MR. MURRAY's July list of forthcoming books contains a mass of interesting announcements, from which we select the following. Among Naval, Military and Imperial books we find Mr. Arnold-Forster's "The Army in 1906," which contains a discussion of Mr. Haldane's proposals; Mr. W. Basil Worsfold's "Lord Milner's Work in South Africa, a record of his administration from its commencement in 1897 to the Peace of Vereeniging in 1902, containing hitherto unpublished information," which is said to afford a powerful object-lesson in the necessity for the creation of a Representative Council of the Empire; Mr. R. C. F. Maugham's "Manica and Sofala," an illustrated account of the territory of the Mozambique Company, tracing the Portuguese occupation from the fifteenth century, and giving much information on the habits and customs of the natives, sport, climate, etc.; a translation from the German by Charles Sydney Goldman of Lieut.-General Frederick von Bernhardt's "Cavalry in Future Wars," with an introduction by Sir John French; Mr. James R. Thursfield's "Nelson and other Naval Studies," including a reprint of the series of articles in the Times on "Trafalgar and the Nelson Touch"; a translation by Mrs. C. E. Barrett-Lennard of F. A. Dressler's "Moltke in his Home," with an introduction by Lord Methuen; "The Industrial Organization of an Indian Province," by Dr. Theodore Morison, formerly Principal at the College at Aligarh, in which attention is concentrated on the village as the unit of economic and industrial organisation; and a translation by Captain Robert Grant of Lieutenant Hesibo Tikovara's narrative, "Before Port Arthur in a Torpedo Boat," the journal of a Japanese officer who took part in all the sea operations under Togo down to the fall of Port Arthur. We notice also M. René Huchon's two volumes, "George Crabbe and his Times," to which frequent reference was made at the time of the Crabbe celebrations last year, and "Mrs. Montagu and her friends," a sketch of the lady of whose correspondence Mrs. Climensson gave us a portion through the same publisher during the past season. Among important art-books to come from Mr. Murray during the autumn are a translation by Mr. R. H. Hobart Cust (the author of the admirable work on Giovanni Antonio Bazzi recently reviewed in these columns) of Ludwig and Molmenti's "Life and Works of Vittorio Carpaccio," the Venetian painter, and Mr. H. M. Cundall's "History of British Water-Colour Painting" with a chronological list of the painters, with dates of birth and death and brief accounts of their lives, etc., beginning with the early miniatures and closing with the last decade of the last century. Among science books, the most important announced is Mr. Robert H. Lock's "Recent Advances in the study of Variation, Heredity and Evolution," which describes the connection between the new science of Genetics and the ideas which have long been summed up under the expression "Darwinism."

Encouraged by the reception of Professor Lindsay's "New Testament," Messrs. Dent are to issue in one of their series of reprints the Old Testament complete, probably in three volumes. The text will be that of the Authorised Version.

A new work of humour entitled "The Dogs of War," by Mr. Walter Emanuel, author of "Dog Days" (now in its thirty-fifth thousand), has been acquired by Messrs. Bradbury, Agnew and Company, Limited, the proprietors of Punch, in which journal its serial publication will shortly commence. It will be illustrated by Mr. Cecil Aldin.

Mr. W. G. Snowsill, the chief librarian of the Central Library, in Peckham Road, is engaged in compiling a small volume of biographical and other facts relating to notable people who were born, sometime resident in, or in other ways connected with Camberwell. Some interesting details respecting Ruskin, Browning, Jowett, Alfred Domett, Talfourd, Tom Hood, William Black, Eliza Cook, W. Beatty Rands, Angus Bethune Reach, among many other old-time Camberwellians, will appear.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash will publish on the 26th of this month "The Invasion of 1910, with a Full Account of the Siege of London," by Mr. William Le Queux. The Naval chapters contained in the book are written by Mr. H. W. Wilson, and Lord Roberts has written a preface.

Mr. William Heinemann announces that he will publish Mrs. F. A. Steel's new novel, "The Sovereign Remedy," early in August. The scene is laid in Wales.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have nearly ready Mrs. Clara Bell's translation of M. Pierre Loti's new novel of Turkish life. "Disenchanted" deals with a problem of great interest, namely, the revolt of highly educated women against the restrictions of harem life. The book throws light on the domestic life of Turkey.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Referring to those ambiguous words which you suggest should be as ambiguously spelt, I beg to point out that if you consult a dictionary to ascertain the French or the German for see, you do not wish the word for sea. Conversely, the foreigner reading English, and looking out the words sea or air does not want to be troubled with the significations of the other homophones.

To distinguish by spelling, instead of by quoting Latin words is less troublesome when dealing with matters about words, whether in conversation or in dictionaries, concordances, grammars, etc. If agreement were arrived at as to some fifty of such words as really give trouble as in "he lives two lives" ar(e) wer(e) hav(e) eat-ate cou(l)d, this would save the expense of burning all our school-books periodically because pronunciation is always altering. If we alter too much, in which case universal acceptance will not ensue, English will get as difficult to read for foreigners as Danish is.

SPELLING AND PRONUNCIATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I make a few remarks on spelling reform, of which you spoke in your last number but one? In the first place, I think that the reformers will do well to act upon the famous maxim, "festina lente." To imagine that our English spelling can be reformed by reading a single paper or writing a single article is as unpractical as to fancy that the English language or the English constitution can be reformed by the same summary process. The strange and incomprehensible forces which mould human speech cannot be controlled by any magician's wand. A contributor in your last number dwells on the paramount influence of "example." He must be qualifying for citizenship in "Cloud-cuckoo-town" or "Laputa," if he cherishes the fond delusion that any example under the sun can be effectual in such matters. Take two instances. All the vast authority of the Authorised Version, combined with the intrinsic beauty of the word, has been unable to save "abide" from disuse; and a second Swift or a second Burke would only make himself ridiculous if he were to write, "I intend to abide in the country for a few days"; nay more, we have added insult to injury by perverting it in the grotesque and vulgar phrase, "I can't abide him!" Again, all the influence of the Authorised Version, combined with the influence of immortal classics, like the "Pilgrim's Progress," and with the intrinsic reasonableness of the usage, has been unable to save "thou" from disuse. We leave it to the poets, who, of course, are eccentric and fantastic folk, and quite beneath the notice of sensible and practical men!

If, then, there is to be spelling reform, let us begin with the most modest aims. Is it hopeless to arrive at some decision between "e" and "i" in "inquire" and "enquiry," or between "s" and "z" in such words as "civilize" and "civilisation"? Why must we see-saw between "connection" and "connexion"? Why drop the "e" in "truly" and retain it in "purely"? Cannot all verbs derived from "cedo" be spelt alike? Is there any valid reason for the diversity of "conceive" and "retrieve" except the confusion of National Schools? Why should the "e" be present or absent at random in such words as "notable" and "noticeable"? Must the two forms "canvas" and "canvass" co-exist? Is it a law of the Medes and Persians that we should have "plow" in the Old Testament, and "plough" in the New, of our English Bibles? Shall we never agree about the final "or" and "our"? Will "ostler" and "hostelry" never be brought into line? As to the final mute "e," I do not object to that, because the French has it also. Or is it incumbent on our dignity to deny that our language was "made in France" as well as "made in Germany"?

In the second place, I do not believe that any reform in spelling will avail unless it goes hand in hand with a reform in pronunciation. If the one is erratic, the other will infallibly be erratic also. Just look at the five words "though," "through," "cough," "chough," "thorough," all spelt alike and all pronounced differently! Look at "wind" (the noun), pronounced to rhyme with "thinned" in ordinary talk, but in some of the masterpieces of our literature made to rhyme with "mind"! Look at "here" and "there"! Look at "present" pronounced differently according as it is noun and verb, and "consent" pronounced in the same way, whether it be noun or verb! Look at the grotesque inconsistency in our pronunciation of the first syllable of "Beauchamp" and "Beaumaris"! As to the pronunciation of "Marylebone," "Cirencester," and "Cholmondeley," it might have been invented by a lunatic. Who can read without a sense of its absurdity Pope's famous line: "Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things"? And the legend of the American girl who defended her pronunciation of "sinpul's" by the analogy of "sinjun" is apt enough. Then observe the practical difficulties which arise. A friend eloquently discoursed on the duty of writing and pronouncing "shamefacedness" as "shamefastness," until I quietly asked him what he would do with Wordsworth's line: "And maidenly shamefacedness," when he straightway became dumb.

"CONCEALED POETS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is difficult for the ordinary mind to discern what Mr. A. Hall is driving at in his letter under this heading in to-day's ACADEMY.

In an epistle to John Davies, the poet, afterwards Attorney-General, written from Gray's Inn on March 28, 1603, Francis Bacon begs Davies to move his influence with the king on his (Bacon's) behalf. He asks his friend "to perform to me all the good offices which the vivacity of your wit can suggest to your mind to be performed to one in whose affection you have so great sympathy, and in whose future you have so great an interest. So desiring you to be good to concealed poets.

I continue

Your very assured

FR. BACON.

This letter is addressed to a poet who confesses to be a "concealed poet." That is to say, that he was the author of poetical writings which he does not acknowledge.

In his Apology for Essex, Bacon confesses: "It happened, a little before that time, that her Majesty had a purpose to dine at Twickenham Park, at which time I had (although I profess not to be a poet) prepared a sonnet directly tending and alluding to draw on her Majesty's reconciliation to my Lord [Essex], which I remember I also showed to a great person." Where is this sonnet? Nos. 56, 57, or 58 of the Shakespearean Sonnets seem to come very near the Baconian intention. They seem to "fit in" remarkably well. Mr. Hall, if I read his letter aright, appears to suggest that the expression "concealed poets" refers to Sir Nicholas Bacon, the father of Francis; but, as Sir Nicholas died in 1679, when Francis was a boy, Nicholas could not possibly be one of the "concealed poets"—if there were more than one—alluded to in the letter of the live man on whose behalf the letter was written. And I have yet to learn, after consulting the Oxford Dictionary, that the word "concealed," as Mr. Hall suggests, can be held to mean "anonymous and inedited."

What is the meaning of Bacon's allusion to "concealed poets?" Spedding, Bacon's great biographer, says: "The allusion to 'concealed poets,' I cannot explain. But as Bacon occasionally wrote letters and devices which were to be fathered by Essex, he may have written verses for a similar purpose, and Davis may have been in the secret."

This explanation is not very satisfactory. We know that Essex produced "masques," and we know that Bacon wrote them, and that everybody knew at the time that Bacon wrote them. There was no concealment on the subject at Gray's Inn. We have Bacon's acknowledged dramatic work in The Misfortunes of Arthur, A Conference of Pleasure, the Gesta Graiorum, the Essex "Device," and The Mask of Flowers—all of them in a combination of verse and prose.

The concealment could not refer, as has been suggested, to Bacon's translation of the Psalms, written in 1624 and published under his name in the following year; so that we have still to learn what and where the poetry is that Francis Bacon confessed to concealing.

GEORGE STRONACH.

WAGNER AND LEIT MOTIF

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was much struck by the concluding portion of H.C.C.'s Article, "A Sidelight on Wagner," where that writer propounds the opinion that Wagner's employment of the leit motif was in great measure owing to the maestro's natural inability to produce true melody, so that he was compelled to excogitate this technical device as a substitute for the ordinary and traditional airs required in operatic composition. Although fully in agreement with the latter part of his criticism, I cannot help thinking that H.C.C. has, while keeping the music of the "Ring" and of the composer's more ambitious works chiefly in mind, overlooked the operas of his second period; for in truth there is here an abundance, not to say a prodigality of melody, and that of an altogether uncommon and exalted kind: as in Tannhäuser's noble song when dashing aside the lyre, in the charming Spinnlied, and in the Swan Song in Lohengrin, to mention only a few instances; but their number sensibly diminishes as one reaches the period of the music drama proper. By this time Wagner's melody seems to have exhausted itself, bubbling forth only at rare and far-distant intervals, the leit motif in its later phase taking its place.

The invention of this expedient in its cruder form, which is said to be identical with the idée fixe of Berlioz (1830), according to Sir Charles Parry; although there may lie foreshadowings of it in the musical phrases of Bach, Mozart and Weber, and traces of it in Mendelssohn and in the Prophète (1849) is generally attributed to Wagner himself. In his "earlier operas," Sir Charles says, "there are only suggestions of the principle" which, in his later works, was worked up into a perfected and complex system. There is, I cannot help thinking, still more direct and palpable evidence of the source whence Wagner derived his idea of the potentialities of leit motif than that already adduced, certainly earlier than the performance of the Prophète, which only appeared in 1849, subsequently that is, to both the Flying Dutchman (1843) and Tannhäuser (1845).

While witnessing a recent representation of the Huguenots (1836) at Brussels, the conviction was repeatedly forced upon me during the steady progress of the piece that—strange as it may undoubtedly sound in the uttering—here, in Luther's hymn, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," is to be found the real germ of Wagner's leit motif in its simplest and most expressive form, adopted as a means to heighten the effect, accentuate the situation, and conserve the attention of the audience, as carried out in the compositions of his maturer years. A comparison of dates will prove that such a connection of cause and effect is only too probable, especially when one takes note of the obvious parallel between the Lutheran chorale, heard first in the overture to the Huguenots and then successively through each act, and the "Pilgrim's chorus" in Tannhäuser, the latter being a very palpable imitation, as it seems to me, of the former. It was an infinitely bold thing for Meyerbeer, a German and a Jew by birth, writing too for a Parisian audience, intensely Catholic in sympathy, to choose as the backbone of his work a theme so familiar as the Protestant chant; but the result showed that his genius possessed that valuable quality, which Bismarck characterised as "liberté d'appréciation et liberté d'action," a sure passport to success, when fate seems to point the way. Though both Berlioz and Liszt were ready to admit the triumph obtained by Meyerbeer, the then struggling musician whom he so often befriended, and for whose works he first obtained an adequate public performance, could only write thus in "Oper und Drama" of his benefactor: "In Meyerbeer's music there is shown such an appalling emptiness, shallowness and artistic nothingness, that . . . we are tempted to set down his specific musical capacity at zero. . . ." Surely this was naught but an inspiration of the green-eyed monster, preaching the doctrine of "Summum jus, summa injuria."

With all Meyerbeer's inequality and occasional crudity, with all his improbabilities and anachronisms, as in Robert le Diable more particularly, modern music owes to him, perhaps, more than to any other composer, the conception of the grand romantic drama, with its passion, wealth of colouring, intensity of interest, differentiation of character and effective ballet music, factors which still retain for his operas a continued popularity, and which have already found their highest musical expression probably in Gounod's Faust.

Again, if we compare Meyerbeer's use of the fore-mentioned hymn with Wagner's treatment of the "Prize Song" in the Meistersinger, it will become evident, I think, that whereas the simpler melody, though introduced several times in the opera, always occurs at the proper harmonic moment, never palling on the ear, but rather gaining each time in cadence and solemnity; Wagner is so absorbed with the elaboration of his exquisitely beautiful but withal artificial air, as to become, apparently from a constant iteration of it in one or other of its varied forms, too much enamoured of his own sweetness, thereby subjecting the temper of his audience to an unduly severe test; even if, out of respect, they refuse to regard such monotony as nauseating.

As regards Mr. Baughan's charge that Wagner "does not make the dramatic needs of his theatre-music subservient to a symphonic design," I would only observe that the music of the Ring in particular appears to me to possess the characteristics of epic rather than of dramatic composition, and that it should be so considered when performed in the concert hall; here the composer has, to all appearances, approached nearer to a resemblance to the "Iliad" or the "Odyssey" than to that of the Greek tetralogy, which was his ostensible aim and model. In any case, I trust some of the readers of the ACADEMY will be able to concur in my view that Wagner, if he could only have allowed the fact, was deeply indebted to the Huguenots for the inception at least of the principle of his leit motif, whatever ideas in the abstract may have been previously present in his mind.

THE GRAMMARIAN ABROAD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been familiar for years, not only with such expressions as "like we do," but with the confusion of who and whom by all our minor novelists, but I am surprised to find in Mr. Benson's "Angel of Pain" such a phrase as "Madge had succeeded in giving the impression of calculation to one whom she knew calculated" (p. 46) or "fidelity of those whom one thought were friends" (p. 169). Bad grammar in dialogue might be excused on the plea that people talk thus, but it is a different thing when an author speaks in his own person, and it may be presumed, has read his proofs. When the Duke of Argyll writes—"the Duke of Newcastle . . . whom we all thought had been ill-used," we may be sure that had he published his auto biography he would have corrected such a slip of the pen. Nor would Wesley have printed, as he wrote to his brother, "Let you and I build the city of God." But living novelists surely should avoid such blunders. Why, moreover, has the printer's reader abdicated? He attends to the spelling, except indeed in allowing the verb wile to figure as while. Why is he not equally vigilant as to grammar?

THE PRONUNCIATION OF "KNOWLEDGE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The following quotation shows how Rudyard Kipling pronounces the word:

And we all praise famous men—
Ancients of the College;
For they taught us common sense—
Tried to teach us common sense—
Truth and God's Own Common Sense,
Which is more than knowledge.

It is from the verses prefixed to "Stalky & Co."

FOREIGN LANGUAGES IN THE SCHOOLS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A most interesting and highly instructive article from the pen of Dr. Louis Elkind has just appeared in The Fortnightly Review on the subject of Germany and the causes of the tremendous advance which that country has made within recent years in the spheres of commerce and industry. Dr. Elkind affirms that one of the chief reasons for Germany's prosperity is the great pains taken to master foreign languages. He writes: "German firms are competing strongly with British firms in markets which, at one time, were almost entirely in the hands of British merchants, and this is not surprising, for the British representative, as a rule, has little or no knowledge of the language of the country in which he travels for orders, whilst the German is able to speak it fluently. It is extraordinary that British firms should continue to send abroad representatives who can speak no other language but their own." This is a very important subject, and Dr. Louis Elkind, who is undoubtedly the ablest and most competent writer on foreign affairs living in this country, deserves great credit for bringing this question prominently before the English public. Now, what I should like to know is this: Has Great Britain taken any decisive steps during the last few years in the matter of teaching foreign languages in the public schools? I am afraid the answer will be in the negative. A complicated Education Bill is now before Parliament, which seems to deal chiefly with religious questions, whereas really enlightened education, such as the earnest study of foreign languages, is scarcely touched upon. This deplorable state of things surely ought not to continue, and I trust that Dr. Louis Elkind's admirable article (the best which has ever been written on this particular subject) may be seriously considered, and that it will bear good fruit.

THE BOOKSHELF

Sexti Properti Opera omnia. By H. E. Butler, M.A., Fellow of New College, Oxford. (Constable, 8s. 6d. net.)—On editions of Propertius the editor is disappointing, with false dates, misquotations and omissions. Mr. Butler, however, has become charmingly independent of Professor Phillimore, Rothstein, and "N." He follows Professor Tyrrell with mitti at iii. 11, 23. He has missed—what Professor A. E. Housman (Class. Rev., 1905, p. 320) explained—the meaning of requiescere, where he prints his own conjecture, lubet (for licet), in ii. 17, 15. Lubet is suspiciously similar to the "jubet" (two lines before) of Jules Didot, published in 1832. (The same Didot, in the same year, anticipated Professor A. Palmer's 1880 sidat, for sudet, iv. 8, 7, 8.) In ii. 2, 11, Mr. Butler has not accepted Burmann's ossais. He has, however, against Professor Postgate, taken Turnehus's Brino in ii. 2, 12. He has missed the certain ter campos, for per campos, in iii. 1, 28, and the equally certain veru (veru), for viro, in iii. 6, 30, where the line should run:

cinctaque funesto lanea vitta veru (vero).

(For use of veru, as applied to tombs, cf. Orelli's Inscript. no. 736, vol. ii. ed. 1828, Inscr. apud Fabretti, p. 684, no. 85.) In iv. 6, 49, though "D" reads inimantis, Mr. Butler did not duly think of Mimantis. Baehrens's difficulty over illaque in ii. 25, 45, might itself have suggested pullaque, but no. We miss also macies (better than facies) canum, iii. 16, 17; fax (preferable to mox) in iii. 12, 26. At iv. 1, 65, Mr. Butler ignores, or is ignorant of, the Codex Lusaticus, published in 1899, at Marburg, by Paul Köhler, and again lately, by the same, in the Philologus. Mr. Butler gives Asis as the reading of Mr. O. L. Richmond. It is that (expunged) of the Lusaticus, which bears date Padua, 1469. So Messrs. O. L. Richmond, and A. Palmer (Dublin: 1880) have been anticipated by this manuscript and by J. Didot (Paris: 1832), respectively. The same manuscript has, at ii. 16, 1, the reading precor (for prator). Could it have intended Venit ab Illyricis praco, etc.? Köhler's manuscript throws light on another passage, i. 8, 27, the line with which Mr. Butler begins a new elegy (following Lipsius's suggestion), and which reads thus: "hic erat manet et" (expunged), whence one may perhaps reconstitute: "hic era, et hic jurata manet." Mr. Butler misses the beauty (pointed out by Professor Postgate) of una in i. 13, 36: "may she in her one person . . ." He does not take, as is probably right, uno as a dat.: in ii. 1, 47. (So Prop. uses uni as a gen., serta and cassida as nom. sing., and, seemingly, verum for veru, as does Plautus.) Poor Professor Postgate is most unfairly treated at ii. 34, 91, nothing less, in fact, than accused of a reading of which he is not guilty. Nothing shows Mr. Butler's acquaintance with the new manuscript, which is apparently due to two hands, one following the Neapolitan ("N") Codex, and the other resembling the class D.V.A.F. The "more important" second edition of Lachmann is, for all its "importance," not referred to. Teuffel's "Geschichte der römischen Literatur" is called "History of Latin Literature."

Manual of Descriptive Annotation for Library Catalogues. By E. A. Savage, with [a] chapter on Evaluation and [an] historical note by E. A. Baker, M.A. (Library Supply Co., 5s. net.)—This is an endeavour to systematise the whole of our knowledge of annotating books in this country, and to formulate an efficient code of rules. Up to the publication of this volume the only information available is contained in various professional and other magazine articles and papers. As a pioneer manual the book is deserving of the highest praise. The first impression it gives is one of amazement at the vast amount of knowledge and information required in what is either an art or a science—which it is librarians have not yet decided, although the author inclines to the former. The second is that, after all, the thing is so simple when put into a concrete form; and finally the reader is left wondering why the work of the book has not been done before. The close grading of juvenile books is good, and "under no circumstances should the language of the annotation be simpler than the language of the book," but in practice a child of fourteen will be rather shy of asking for a book which has been graded into the section of books suitable for children of ten. The author gives two good definitions

(a) of Annotation . . . "the term applied to all processes of describing the leading features and ideas of books in a succinct manner, whether by analysis or criticism or both together." (b) Accurate and impartial evaluation (assuming that such is possible) is exposition. It is a pity, however, that this was not made to coincide with that given by Mr. Baker in his chapter on "Evaluation or Characterisation:" "'Critical annotation,' the English phrase for the same thing [evaluation] . . ." Evaluation is a word widely used in America, but one which is not yet clearly understood on this side of the Atlantic. Few librarians, we think, will agree with the author when he estimates that two assistants, one of them a junior, can write efficient annotations for twenty books every hour, and that the final correction "will occupy one half that time." It is strange, too, that although the book relies, necessarily, very largely upon American methods, exception should be taken to the "personal tone": this form, sometimes called individual advertising, is admittedly in bad taste, but it is scarcely to be described as "annotative pap," and is one of the most successful of American methods of advertising. It is true that advertisement is not an essential element of book annotation, but it is nevertheless inherent in it. The elisions recommended sometimes lead to curious pieces of construction, as on p. 11. . . . "A text-book for younger students than Bright's 'History.'" The great danger of the detailed annotation describing the scope of a book is its limitation. The need for a catalogue for librarians is recognised, but it is a subject of great importance. Several attempts have been made other than those mentioned in Mr. Baker's "Historical note." The Library Bureau launched an elaborate scheme, and an agency in one of the northern towns in later days essayed a similar scheme, but both, unfortunately, came to nothing. Not enough attention has been devoted to "supplements," when a great deal of the information given in the general catalogue must be repeated (when in printed form); and the method of "practical work" described does not provide sufficient facilities for discovering errors in the general catalogue, nor for emendations of previous notes. In America, where the special education of the librarian is much more highly organised than in this country, annotation is a recognised and highly developed study, although even here annotated catalogues of books or their authors have been in use for several centuries. The plan of putting the annotation under the subject entry, although contrary to a general practice and followed in its entirety by only a few library catalogues, is a good one, although there is much to be said in favour of putting the author note under the author entry. The breadth of view taken of the subject is commendable. It is recognised that a note need not be below the entry, but may be a part of the entry, and that a note that is below the entry may contain matter from the sub-title of the book, and also that the note legitimately includes the qualifications of the author and the relation of his work to other books on the same subject.

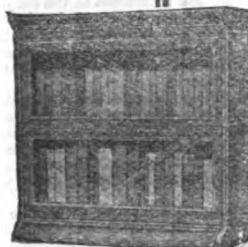

We have received from Mr. Clegg, of the Aldine Press, Rochdale, the seventh annual of the "International Directory of Booksellers" (6s.) a compilation invaluable to all who are concerned with the commercial side of literature, and of great interest to the book-maker and the book-buyer. Those familiar with the previous issues will know the fulness and accuracy of the contents. The booksellers of the world, the Public Libraries of the world, the publishers, book collectors, societies and institutions, Universities and Colleges of the world are among the tabulated lists given; and the bibliographies of Book and Library Catalogues, trade journals, etc., Concordances and Bookplates are features of very great service. In the seventh issue there appear for the first time lists of "Bookbinders in London and the Provinces, Record and Literary Searchers; Translators and Indexers; Colonial and Foreign Learned and Scientific Societies; Literary Agents (English and American); South African Public Schools; and American Educational Institutions." Fine Art is not neglected; nor are autographs, press-cutting agencies, carriers, copyright registration and a hundred other subjects of daily importance to many. Want of space has crowded out the lists of fictitious names used by authors and book-illustrators, but these can be found in the 1891 issue; and those of living authors, etc., in the "Who's Who Year Book." The "International Directory of Booksellers" is a volume without which no reference shelf is complete. It is brought right up to the moment by two pages of "Additions and changes during printing" and an extra, still later, slip, and the Editor's modest regard for corrections of mistakes is not likely to find many replies, so carefully is the work compiled and edited.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE past season, though we have heard the usual complaints of "slackness in the book-market," has not been altogether unfruitful of good books. Certainly, there is little decrease in the number of books published: if statisticians can show any falling-off, it will be but another proof that we have many more books than any one can read—many more than are good for us. Examination of the lists of the past season shows, too, that this is not a great age of imagination. It is not an age of poetry, of poetic drama; it is not an age—we venture to think—of fiction.

And we venture to think so in spite of the long lists of novels that clamour at us from the "Books Received" columns of the past six months. Out of all these hundreds, how many could an honest and a sensible man declare to be really worth the reading? How many show anything more than a passable knowledge of the technique of the art and a narrow view of life? The number that could be sincerely declared to have anything approaching greatness in them is still smaller. True, it has not been a good season for novels: the usual novel-writers have been busy and there is a large consignment of first or early efforts; but we believe this season's crop to be below the average.

One or two novels only stand out as worth special attention; and two of these come from America—Mr. Owen Wister's delightful "Lady Baltimore," a book of charm, of depth, of power very gently used, of wisdom never obtruded, and Mr. Upton Sinclair's "The Jungle," which circumstance has made notable. Of English novels, Mr. John Galsworthy's "The Man of Property" contains more both of promise and performance than any other; Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer's "The Fifth Queen" shows a brilliance unusual in England; Mr. Reginald Turner has added to a fast increasing reputation for independence and humour, and Mrs. Wilfrid Ward's "Out of due Time" is not to be neglected. For the rest, Mr. E. F. Benson, Mr. Charles Marriott, Mr. and Mrs. Thurston and the rest, they have only shown once more that they are clever but not great nor wise; while Mr. Eden Phillpotts and Mrs. Humphry Ward, both of whom have the stuff of greatness in them, have not conquered their besetting sins. Still, there are plenty of novels, "Q.'s" "The Mayor of Troy," Mr. Maartens's "The Healers," Mr. Arnold Bennett's "Hugo," the Baroness von Hutten's further volume on the delightful Pam, and stories by Mr. Keble Howard, Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, Mr. Oliver Onions and other clever people, which holiday-makers will do well to read.

The poetry has been a little more interesting than usual, if only for two books: Mr. Noyes's brave attempt to write the English Epic of Drake, and Mr. Doughty's more than interesting "Dawn in Britain." The latter is only for the "serious" reader; it is not a book for the esplanade or the deck-chair; but its learning, its force and its dignity make it notable. Sir Mortimer Durand, too, in "Cyrus the Great King," has produced an epic-drama which, for all its many faults, is a work of power and some greatness. Mr. Sturge Moore has published nothing; Mr. John Davidson's new poems, reviewed in another column, will interest many; Mr. Ellis Roberts is a young poet of force and promise, and the "Tower Press Booklets" from Dublin contain many things that will charm the lover of poetry. The greater among our living poets have been silent: on the smaller let us be silent, too.

The best work nowadays is being done in biography, history, criticism and works that combine creation with compilation. Few more brilliant biographies have been written than Mr. Winston Spencer Churchill's Life of his father, Lord Randolph Churchill; and among the masterpieces of historical biography Mr. J. B. Atlay's "Victorian Chancellors" must find a place, if the future volumes are as good as that published this spring. Mr. Charles Whibley's "Pitt," too, is as strong a piece of work as that trenchant and learned writer has ever accomplished. Mr. Thomas Wright's Life of Sir Richard Burton is remarkable for the author's patience and security rather than for any sign of genius in the making of the book, and the composite biography, as exemplified by the Life of Archbishop Temple by seven friends and of Henry Sidgwick, shows its necessary drawback—the lack of any single impression of the subject as seen and conveyed by a single mind. Miss Sichel's Life of Canon Ainger makes capital reading, owing mainly to the good things provided by Ainger himself and his friends; as a biography it is a little feeble. Of the other biographies of the season, Mr. Mackintosh's Chamberlain, Mr. Downey's Lever, Mrs. Climençon's Elizabeth Montagu, Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's Sir Henry Irving, and various books on George Buchanan, all that can be said is that, in their various degrees of merit, they make good enough reading and serve their purpose for the moment. Buck Whaley's Memoirs is a book in a class by itself, but full of amusement; and Lady De Lancey's narrative of a week at Waterloo is unique in its simple pathos and touching circumstance. Of autobiographies, there are Tolstoy's (in progress) and Sir Henry Roscoe's—both of great interest.

Though historians may squabble over the proper ways to write history—of which there are as many as there are of writing tribal lays—there is no question of the value of the historical work that is being done. It is not the age of the brilliant historian. We should not turn to Messrs. Longman's admirable Political History for the entertainment we derive from Froude or Macaulay; but it is a work of sound scholarship, wide learning and able presentation which will give the student of the political history of England what he can find nowhere else. Another invaluable enterprise is the Cambridge Modern History, truly a κτῆμα ἐς αἰῶνα—for the materials collected in these handsome volumes can never be superseded, though there is ever room for new comment and interpretation of facts. The ninth volume, "Napoleon," is a fascinating work to read, and a man might spend his holiday evenings worse than in such company. The student of naval and military matters will find good things to his hand in Mr. Skrine's "Fontenoy," Mr. Fraser's "The Enemy at Trafalgar," Captain Klado's great book on the Naval conflict between Japan and Russia; while the fourth volume of the Times History of the War in South Africa, and the first volume of the Official History, with its admirable maps, are both productions of the season that has just closed. Sir Auckland Colvin's Egypt is a notable work of modern history, and among other works worth naming are the late Bishop Stubbs's posthumous lectures on Early English History, Mr. Shore's "Origins of the Anglo-Saxon Race," and Professor Oman's "Great Revolt of 1381," which we reviewed last week.

Good work has been done, too, in art—though not very much of it. Probably the most interesting book of the season is a very modest little volume by Mr. A. J. Finberg on the English Water-Colour Painters, surprisingly suggestive and informative for its size and likely to rouse thought in a greater degree than many more pretentious books. M. Bouchot has issued in book-form his extraordinary but interesting notions on the French Primitives; Mr. R. H. Hobart Cust has written a really admirable book on Giovanni Antonio Bazzi, and Mr. Wedmore has delighted lovers of good writing and individual criticism by his "Whistler and others." A sound and learned book is Mr. McKay's "Scottish School of Painting"; and Mr. Newbolt's Vandyck is one of the best volumes in a series which helps to put Messrs. George Newnes at the head of the art-publishers of the day.

Of books on literature there have not been very many; but one or two are noteworthy. We have had the first volume of Professor Saintsbury's History of Prosody, an invaluable and delightful book; Mr. Greg's interesting if imperfect Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama; Mr. G. M. Trevelyan's admirable study of the Poetry and Philosophy of Mr. George Meredith, and Mr. Arthur C. Benson's much discussed volume in the English Men of Letters Series on Walter Pater. Two American books, Mr. Ferris Greenslet's Lowell and Miss Elizabeth Luther Cary's Henry James, are worth studying. Meanwhile the reprint industry flourishes. Mr. Frowde has bought the World's Classics and is adding new treasures to the long list; Messrs. Dent have inaugurated with the first hundred volumes their Everyman's Library, and Messrs. Methuen, if they have not pushed the Imperial Library as we should like to have seen, have added one good book, Mr. A. R. Waller's Sir Thomas Browne, and several others of interest. The other series are as many and as vigorous as ever; but more and more are lovers of classical literature looking with eagerness to the productions and promises of the Cambridge University English Classics.

In his just published "Autobiography," to which reference was recently made in the ACADEMY, Mr. A. B. Todd, relates that both his father and mother had frequently seen John Burns, and that his eldest brother—he himself is a seventh son and fourteenth child—was born two months before the death of the Scottish poet. Mr. Todd, now in his eighty-fifth year, has conversed with many, besides his father, who knew Burns and had frequently been in his company, and none of them, he has often heard them say, ever heard the poet "utter an oath, saw him angry, or saw him intoxicated." It was Hew Ainslie, a Scottish bard, Mr. Todd tells us, who first gave to Ayrshire and Nithsdale "the exceedingly happy, appropriate, and poetic name of 'The Land of Burns.'"

It is to be hoped that the grounds of the mansion, once the house of Richard Owen Cambridge, on the Middlesex side of Richmond bridge, which are to be put up for sale at the end of this month, may find a purchaser who will appreciate their literary associations. Richard Owen Cambridge had many friends. Boswell talks of his "extensive circle of friends and acquaintances, distinguished by rank, fashion and genius," and among them may be mentioned Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Dr. Johnson, Gray and Horace Walpole. Cambridge was well known in his time for his wit, learning and literary attainments, and he was regarded as one of the ablest contributors to The World of his day. Very few of his bons mots have been preserved, but one may be recalled in connection with this paper. As he was going into church one Sunday, a note was put into his hand requesting an essay for The World. His wife, observing him rather inattentive during the sermon, asked him what he was thinking of: to which he replied: "Of the next World my dear."

Ripon, where an historic pageant took place during last week, is not unconnected with English literature. It was the birthplace of Dr. John Burton, the famous antiquarian, whom Sterne has immortalised as "Dr. Slop." Dr. John Burton was a respected member of society, who had earned a considerable reputation for his skill as an accoucheur; but he had excited the ire of Sterne, perhaps because he was possessed of "a little squat uncourtly figure with breadth of back and sesquipedality of belly," or perhaps because he was suspected of having Jacobite and even "Popish" sympathies. Whatever the true cause may have been, there are few more cruel portraits in English literature than that of Dr. Slop, who, as good Shandean will remember, met with Obadiah and the coach-horse, arrived too late to assist in bringing Master Tristram into this "scurvy and disastrous world," and had his views on baptism very thoroughly searched.

The matter-of-fact directness with which translators tear off the veil from poetically vague titles must often disconcert English romanticists. How, for instance, the chivalrous courtliness of Scott seems to evaporate by the metamorphosis of "The Heart of Midlothian" into the homespun bluntness of "Le prison d'Édimbourg"! There is something suggestive of turning the keen edge of transatlantic humour against itself in the latest announcement of the Société d'Édition et de Publications (Libraire Félix Junen) Paris. This firm is bringing out a translation of "The Jungle" by M. A. Fournier—the translator's very name has pathological associations—under the sensational title of "Les Empoisonneurs de Chicago."

It is not that the mordant wit of the Gaul cannot make excellent play with the title oblique at times, for one of last week's publications was a pendant to the extremely successful "Lui" under the cognomen of "L'Oncle de l'Europe." Both are volumes in a series which is to deal with high personages "devant l'objectif caricatural," and which is possibly modelled on the opening pages of The Review of Reviews. The introduction of the first volume into Germany was made a matter of majestäts beleidigung; but the satire of the second is less bitter, despite the easier entry into Britain. That the cartoon is becoming the universal alphabet of politics is shown by the inclusion in the collection of specimens from the comic journalism of every considerable country in Europe.

Public librarians are becoming more and more doubtful of the wisdom of expending a part of their scanty income on daily newspapers, nearly all of which are within the means of everybody. Already in some libraries halfpenny papers are not taken. When the Islington Public Libraries are opened the readers will only find one or two daily papers, these being the higher-priced and the more inaccessible to the general public. In place of the large number of dailies usually taken by municipal libraries, the Islington authority will buy as many of the best English and foreign literary, art, scientific and technical journals as possible. We shall watch the experiment with interest.

The Sunderland Public Library made a bold attempt to discontinue the exhibition of daily papers, but the townspeople were so indignant that the managing Committee gave way and decided to retain them. But, after all, it is a library authority's business to choose what it shall provide in the way of reading. The aim—or the principal aim—of the public library is an educational one, and if a committee believes that it is doing its duty in substituting high-class periodicals for daily journals within everybody's means, it ought to have the courage of its convictions. The voice of the people is not a voice of much value in educational matters.

At the same time, it is only right to say that the majority of librarians are still in favour of the retention of periodicals of this class, not because they are in accord with the aims of public libraries, but because they add to the popularity of those institutions. It is argued that the large number of people who come to the libraries simply to see newspapers are persuaded sooner or later to borrow books. This may be true, but it is a question whether the more liberal provision of the better periodicals might not bring more readers of books after all.

Among the torchlight processions, laying of wreaths and other pageantry of the Rembrandt celebrations, one matter of practical interest stands out. At Amsterdam the new room in the Ryksmuseum—the “Night Watch” room, as it is called—was opened, and the famous picture is now seen in the light that suits it best. The room reproduces, as closely as possible, the lighting of the old guild-house of the “Doelen” for which the picture was painted. It has never been seen to advantage in the Ryksmuseum, and it was not till the Rembrandt Exhibition of 1898 that the best lighting for it was discovered by accident. It has been cleaned and varnished, and is now to be seen as it has never been seen before. It is interesting, too, to note that one feature of the celebrations was the performance at the theatre of some scenes from the Medea of Burgomaster Rix, Rembrandt's friend and sitter.

LITERATURE

HOLIDAY VERSE

Holiday and other Poems. With a note on Poetry. By JOHN DAVIDSON. (E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net.)

It is always a pleasure to receive a new book from Mr. John Davidson. He has the vision and faculty of a poet, and any fault-finding to which he gives occasion has always the recognition of this fact behind it. We never think that he is not good, but there are times when we feel that he ought to be better. Unfortunately for himself, he seems to be to a dangerous extent self-satisfied. In an essay on poetry, hidden away at the end of this volume, he is good enough to act as the critic of his own achievement. If this should argue any lack of modesty on his part, it is atoned for by the interest and pleasure with which we hear a man of genuine talent discoursing on his own craft. The present writer felt all the more gratified because one, at least, of the passages on which the poet comments had received more than usual consideration. It may be as well to quote it:

From the Forest I come whereabouts
The silences, harvested, throng—
Autumnal, the silences throng.
No throstle, no blackbird devout
As the seraphim mingle their song,
With perfume entangle the light
And powder the woodland with pearl,
Nor usher the star-stricken night
With incense and melody rare;
The song-thrush devout and the merle
No longer enrapture the air
With concord of ruby and pearl.

But to understand Mr. Davidson's criticism it is necessary to keep in mind that it forms part of an argument in favour of blank verse as against rhyme. About this contention there is really little to say. The essential thing in all great lines, wherever they occur, is harmony, and it is doubtful whether harmony can ever be produced by mere technique. No doubt Stevenson came to think so, but the most fervent admirers of that writer will probably admit that he was more usefully engaged in writing the early chapters of “The Master of Ballantrae” than in counting the vowels and consonants in some of his favourite prose passages. The other lines quoted by Mr. Davidson in support of his argument were struck off by genius at white heat. “In cradle of the rude imperious surge” is an example of that decision of phrase which comes when the vision is so absolutely clear that we call it inspired, and when every faculty of the brain is stimulated to an almost supernatural activity. It is at such transcendent moments that a master like Shakespeare strikes off a phrase so royally minted that it bears the impression of inevitability for ever. Whether he rhymed it or put it in blank verse or stated it in prose makes no difference whatever. It would be easy to place side by side with the splendours of blank verse splendours of rhyme that seem to be equally inevitable. It may be that the poet on these occasions is in a sense more personal. It has ever been the nature of humanity to render musically its deepest griefs and joys. Auguish itself finds musical utterance as in the betrayed maid's ballad:

O had I wist before I kiss'd
That love had been sae hard to win,
I'd ha' locked my heart wi' a golden lock
And pinned it wi' a siller pin;

and in the equally piercing lines of Burns:

Had we never loved sae kindly
Had we never loved sae blindly
Never met and never parted,
We had ne'er been broken-hearted.

These are unimaginable in blank verse. The genius of Coleridge, again, found no expression in blank verse so adequate as it did in “Kubla Khan”:

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan
A stately pleasure-dome decree:
Where Alph, the sacred river, ran Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea.

Here the rhyme obviously suggests something of mystery and beauty—sound, as it were, becoming an auxiliary of the inner eye. The greatest artist in English verse was probably Milton, “mighty-mouthed Milton, inventor of harmonies.” Surely he was a master of blank verse, yet what so majestic as his use of rhyme? No objection that Mr. Davidson urges would apply to such rhymes as those in “At a Solemn Music”:

Blest pair of Sirens, pledges of Heaven's joy,
Sphere-born harmonious sisters, Voice and Verse,
Wed your divine sounds, and mixed power employ,
Dead things with inbreathed sense able to pierce;
And to our high-raised phantasy present
That undisturbed song of pure concent,
Aye sung before the sapphire-coloured throne
To Him that sits thereon,
With saintly shout and solemn jubilee:
Where the bright Seraphim in burning row
Their loud uplifted angel-trumpets blow,
And the Cherubic host in thousand quires
Touch their immortal harps of golden wires,
With those just Spirits that wear victorious palms,
Hymns devout and holy psalms
Singing everlastingly.

There is nothing in Shakespeare's blank verse more dignified and solemn in thought, austere and perfect in workmanship than the dirge in Cymbeline:

Fear no more the heat o' the sun,
Nor the furious winter's rages;
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages:
Golden lads and girls all must,
As chimney-sweepers, come to dust.

Fear no more the frown o' the great;
Thou art past the tyrant's stroke;
Care no more to clothe and eat;
To thee the reed is as the oak:
The sceptre, learning, physic, must
All follow this, and come to dust.

Fear no more the lightning-flash,
Nor the all-dreaded thunder-stone;
Fear not slander, censure rash;
Thou hast finish'd joy and moan:
All lovers young, all lovers must Consign to thee, and come to dust.

In immortal simplicity this is the lamentation and tale of ancient wrong.

Chanted from an ill-used race of men that cleave the soil,
Sow the seed, and reap the harvest with enduring toil,
Storing yearly little dues of wheat, and wine and oil.

When Shakespeare makes Macbeth declare in the spirit of these lines:

My way of life
Is fallen into the sere, the yellow leaf.

no question ought to arise of the superiority of technique. It is altogether a question of preference. If Mr. John Davidson, for example, were to use blank verse instead of rhymed verse, his work would be judged by its quality, not by the form he chose to give it. However, all this is in the nature of a digression from our argument. Mr. Davidson with engaging candour quotes the passage we have transcribed in order to show that rhyme is "a beautiful disease, an excess of health." In fact, he wishes us to regard rhyme as a corruption of the ear. With this in our minds, it is interesting to read the criticism he makes on his own verse quoted above:

A labor leads off upon "about"; a single clarigold rings in the first "throng"; and two others immediately take up the burden an octave lower in the second "throng"; "devout" and "song" bring in the psalter and the anome; "light," "night," "rare," "air," add to these sackbuts and timbrels; with the first "pearl" the dulcimer sounds; the syrinx replies in "merle"; the second "pearl" is a double dulcimer; and the whole fantastic orchestra fills the evening air with richly braided sound.

We confess that we found this criticism very unexpected. The verse quoted we had marked as a specimen of a certain vein in Mr. Davidson for which we can find no apter title than that of "Anna Matilda." The true poet speaks in the first three lines:

From the Forest I come whereabouts
The silences, harvested, throng—
Autumnal, the silences throng.

The echo of Edgar Allan Poe is undoubtedly a blemish, but a pardonable one. But Mr. Davidson, after getting his vision clear, seems to have sat down in his workshop to contrive curious little ornaments that really spoil the simple lines of his beginning. To "entangle light with perfume" is a phrase that ought to be left to the fair Anna Matilda. She might also without injury be granted the monopoly of "the star-stricken night," and hers too shall be "the incense and melody rare" and "the concord of ruby and pearl." Let her, by all means, enrapture the air with them. How the idea of night may be rendered without any of these ingenious but paltry devices may be illustrated from a passage in George Herbert, the example being all the more apt because of Herbert's devotion to ingenuity and his feebleness when he practised it. But how comely and austere is the architecture of—

Yet still thou goest on,
And now when darkness closest weary eyes
Saying to man, It doth suffice:
Henceforth repose; your work is done,

This phraseology is as elemental as is that of the "Lyke-wake Dirge":

When thou from hence away are paste,
Every nighte and alle;
To Whinny-muir thou comest at laste,
And Christ receive thye saule.

This æ nighte, this æ nighte,
Every nighte and alle;
Fire and sleete, and candle lighte,
And Christe receive thy saule.

It is, therefore, a fair conclusion that Mr. Davidson is blaming rhyme for effects that are really produced by his love of tricky ornament. He is in danger of becoming artistic, using the word in that debased sense with which it is usually applied in a suburban villa. Let us, then, look at his poems to see whether this contention is borne out by his practice. They are for the most part light holiday poems, and there is scarcely one that has not a fault of misplaced ingenuity or extravagance. We know how fond our Anna Matilda is of underlining her words, using inverted commas, putting in exclamations, and taking other means of obtaining emphasis. Here is an example of Mr. Davidson's attempts in the same direction:

Till jaded night falls dead,
Wheel, hoof, and horn
Tumultous thunder
Beat Under
A noteless firmament
Of lead.

On this the only comment we need make is that it might just as well have been written in prose. It would be well, too, if he would curb his taste for using uncouth and unfamiliar words, as in "Laburnum and Lilac":

Where the New River strays,
Eddying in olive green
And chrysophrase [sic],
And briefly seen
In traffic-troubled ways.

The best poem in the volume is called "A Runnable Stag," and until very close to the end it leaves nothing for criticism to say; but we are forced to the conclusion that the whole point lies in these two stanzas:

Where he turned at bay in the leafy gloom,
In the emerald gloom where the brook ran deep,
He heard in the distance the rollers boom,
And he saw in a vision of peaceful sleep
In a wonderful vision of sleep,
A stag of warrant, a stag, a stag,
A runnable stag in a jewelled bed,
Under the sheltering ocean dead,
A stag, a runnable stag.

So a fateful hope lit up his eye,
And he opened his nostrils wide again,
And he tossed his branching antlers high
As he headed the hunt down the Charlock glen,
As he raced down the echoing glen
For five miles more, the stag, the stag,
For twenty miles, and five and five,
Not to be caught now, dead or alive,
The stag, the runnable stag.

Here Mr. Davidson endows his stag with human thoughts, for he makes the animal resolve to escape from its misery by suicide instead of taking to the water merely as a means of escaping from its enemies. To give it thoughts and ideas might seem pretty to the lady we have already referred to, but a great writer would not have done it. Even when he is arousing our sympathy for the animal, Shakespeare remains always within his strict limits.

To-day my Lord of Amiens and myself
Did steal behind him as he lay along
Under an oak whose antique root peeps out
Upon the brook that brawls along this wood:
To the which place a poor sequester'd stag,
That from the hunter's aim had ta'en a hurt,
Did come to languish, and indeed, my lord,
The wretched animal heaved forth such groans
That their discharge did stretch his leathern coat
Almost to bursting, and the big round tears
Coursed one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase; and thus the hairy fool,
Much marked of the melancholy Jaques,
Stood on the extremest verge of the swift brook,
Augmenting it with tears.

There remains little more to say about Mr. Davidson. It is evident that what he lacks mostly is discipline and that austerity and economy of language which go with it. The fault looks straight out of the verse, and it is equally noticeable in his essay, which rambles over the whole universe of thought, touching on many things of which Mr. Davidson speaks with no authority and yet containing many interesting and suggestive things. Here we have extravagance both of thought and expression. It is the outpouring of an uncurbed, undisciplined, and vain mind.

THE BELGIAN ARMY IN THE CONGO

Histoire Militaire du Congo. Explorations, Expéditions, Opérations de guerre, Combats et Faits militaires. Par ADOLPHE LEJEUNE-CHOQUET. (Bruxelles: Castaigne, 5fr.)

So much is being said and written about the Congo State just now that any authentic information on the subject or any portion of it is welcome. The author of the volume under notice, M. Lejeune-Choquet, was for some time an officer in the Congo Military Service, and he consequently writes with personal knowledge of his subject, which is exclusively military and non-political. His description, therefore, of the military operations and expeditions carried on by the Congo authorities since the year 1877 supplies information at first hand. The value of the work as history is increased by its being mainly compiled from the Official Reports of the Officers in command, which have been placed at his disposal. We thus get a complete and trustworthy account of the military achievements which established Belgian authority over some twenty million blacks in the heart of Central Africa. As the writer studiously abstains from entering upon controversial matter, the book can be read without prejudice by the adversaries as well as the admirers of the Congo Government. M. Lejeune, now an officer in the Belgian Regiment of the Carabiniers, does not, however, conceal his pride as a Belgian in the achievements of his comrades, who, few in number, imposed obedience on turbulent, cruel, and totally uncivilised races.

Although there were many expeditions, including Stanley's famous advance to Stanley Falls, before the formation of the Congo State in 1884, the main interest of the story commences after that event. At first the expeditions were almost exclusively arranged for the purpose of exploring the region, ascertaining what were the best routes, and establishing commercial stations. During this period there were a certain number of hostile collisions with the native tribes, but on the whole armed force was seldom resorted to. The first operations of war were not brought about by native hostility. They arose from the inevitable trial of strength between the Europeans and the Arabs who had made themselves virtually masters of the country. For a moment it appeared as if war between them might be avoided, for in 1887 the principal Arab chief, Tippu Tip, swore to Stanley that he would keep the peace. It was soon found out, however, that keeping the peace in an Arab sense did not mean any suspension of the operations for capturing slaves, and collisions between Belgian officers and the slave-hunters became frequent. In 1890 the Brussels Conference gave the Congo State a sort of mandate to put an end to the Arab power. A considerable number of officers of the Belgian army volunteered for the campaign, which may be described as aiming at the expulsion of the Arab forces from the valley of the Upper Congo, where they held a succession of stockaded positions. In April 1892 the command of the State forces was entrusted to Dhanis, and the result amply justified the selection.

The description of the Arab campaign fills over twenty pages of the book before us. Without exaggeration, the two campaigns that had to be carried on for the accomplishment of the object for which they were undertaken may be termed brilliant and completely successful. By April 1893 the Arabs were completely vanquished and expelled from all their positions on the Upper Congo. Of course, this success was not obtained without loss, and many Belgian officers perished on the field of battle. The Belgian Army is very proud of the conduct and sacrifices of its comrades on this and other occasions. Having overcome their principal enemies, the Congo authorities looked forward to a period of tranquillity. This reasonable hope was disappointed by a great mutiny among their own native soldiers. During the Arab campaign and immediately after it, the State took into their service a large number of black soldiers belonging to the tribes of the Batetelas and the Bakus. These men, who had originally fought on the side of the Arabs, were subjected to a certain amount of discipline, but there had not been sufficient time to make them thoroughly obedient, when their great chief was executed for indulging in the native practice of cannibalism. His followers swore to be avenged for his execution, and thus the Belgians were confronted with a new peril from their attempt to spread civilisation. The peril was the greater because it was not at once fully realised, and so it came about that, when Dhanis was ordered to march for the Nile in 1897, he had under his orders a thoroughly disaffected force. It had not proceeded very far towards its destination when proof was given of the true feeling of the troops. The advance guard supplied the signal to the rest by surprising and murdering in the night several of their white officers.

The main body followed the example of their comrades, and after a vain attempt to resist the mutineers Dhanis found himself obliged to retreat with the small remnant of his force. Thirteen or fourteen of the white officers were slain and, terrible to relate, eaten by their savage enemy. Much consternation was caused by the news of this revolt, and for more than two years the Belgians were continuously engaged in pursuing and crushing the revolted Batetelas. Had these mutinous soldiers been able to regain the western side of the Congo River, where the home of their race was, there is no saying how far the disaffection might have extended, but the Belgians succeeded in preventing this, and gradually all the mutineers were accounted for in one way or another. The Belgians recall with satisfaction that this great trouble of theirs was entirely due to the energy which they had displayed in putting down cannibalism.

Perhaps the chapters that will most interest the English reader are those describing Chaltin's campaign with the Dervishes on the Nile, eighteen months before Lord Kitchener crushed the Khalifa. The battle of Bedden was a very creditable affair, in which two thousand Dervishes occupying a strong position were defeated with considerable loss. The attack and capture of Redjaf followed, when eight Mahdist chiefs were killed. Nine months later the Dervishes made a night attack to recover possession of this place, but they were repulsed with loss, although the Belgians themselves lost several officers killed and many wounded. From that time to the present the occupation of the Lado district has not been disturbed by any warlike operation. A very interesting account is added of the Lemaire expedition in 1903-5 into the Bahr-el-Ghazal, where that officer succeeded in exploring a large part of the province. Now that the Egyptian authority is definitely established there, the information that he succeeded in collecting about the Niam Niam tribes will prove useful.

Among recent operations those against the Budjas in 1898 and 1900-1 were especially formidable. This tribe holds the region between the Congo and the Mongalla. It is very warlike and courageous, and some of its members had displayed considerable skill as artillerymen in the service of the State; but fifteen years ago they were already designated as a possibly formidable enemy to the Belgians. This they proved themselves to be during the serious fighting of 1900-1, when several Belgian officers lost their lives. Even after these expeditions the Budjas displayed a dubious sentiment towards their European conquerors, and in 1905 a fresh outbreak was feared. The prompt despatch of troops brought them to their senses and ensured their submission without the necessity of resorting to force. The official narrative briefly records that "not a shot was fired." There are references to other affairs, but they are of minor importance. This summary of the contents of this work will show the nature of the obstacles that the Congo State has had to encounter and overcome during its still brief history. It has had to make good its position in Central Africa by feats of military enterprise, and to assert by conquest the right it claimed to rule the negro races along and near the Equator. It is the old story which the Roman poet summed up in the words "debellare superbos," and so far as the record runs the Belgians have done their work well and without avoidable bloodshed. It naturally follows that the Belgian army, which from the neutral character of the country has had little chance of distinction, is very proud of the achievements of its members and comrades in the Congo State, and is rather disposed to resent as a personal slight any charge of cruelty or misconduct against its officers serving in Central Africa. M. Lejeune-Choquet's volume is of permanent value for purposes of reference, and it appears at an opportune moment.

THE ANTIQUARY AND THE SEAL

English Seals. By J. HARVEY BLOOM, M.A., Rector of Whitchurch. Being a volume of "The Antiquary's Books." (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

SETTING before himself a well-chosen trayful of plaster casts from mediæval seal impressions, the student—antiquary or artist—may see in little the arts of the Middle Ages.

A few experts have passed from toying with these dainty works and wondering at their frank beauty to their classification and reasoned study, and by this time a manual for their study should be at hand.

We have now a volume of the "Antiquary's Books" given up to an account of English seals, but this is hardly the volume for which we look. When such a series as the "Antiquary's Books" is planned it will have an essential weakness in the fact that its editor must ask contributors to write him books upon the allotted subjects, and a book thus produced to order within a given time will never be as hardy as the book born in its own due hour.

The Rev. J. Harvey Bloom, author of this volume of "English Seals," has enthusiasm for his task, but his opportunities for study of his subject seem to have been limited, and he has not yet that degree of expertise which the student fairly asks from his teacher.

His main field of study seems to have been the seals preserved at Warwick Castle and in Warwick Museum, and this limited range has encouraged dangerous generalisations on the subject which wider research would have checked.

Mr. Bloom's chapters are well arranged, and his notes may be of some service to those who have not yet understood the variety and beauty of our English seals. His illustrations are numerous and well chosen, Mrs. Canning's delicate pencil drawings being made with great care and, save in one or two cases, with remarkable accuracy. We can hardly agree with Mr. Bloom that these or any drawings excel the reproductions possible by modern photographic processes, but they have the advantage of being able to appear in the text.

The study of the seal, however demands the most patient attention to detail, and it is in accurate detail that Mr. Bloom's work is found wanting. His readings of seal inscriptions have many and serious errors. Let us take the famous seal made in 1343 for Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick. An example of this seal shows the inscription: "S' THO'E COMITIS WARRWYCHIE ANNO REGNI REGIS E' T'CH POST CO'QVESTV' ANGLIE SEPT'O DECI'O ET REGNI SVI FRANCIE QVARTO." This in plain Lombardic letters. Mr. Bloom's version runs: "S' THOM' COMITIS WARRYCHIE ANNO REGNI REGIS E' T'EII POST COQVAS' W . . . DVODECO EZ REGNI SVI FRANCIE QUARTO." The "POST COQVAS' W . . ." he explains as "after the conquest of William."

Again, the inscription on the Durham seal is "SIGILLVM CVDBERHTI PRESVLIS S'CI," and not "SIGILLVM VDBERHTI PRESVLIS DEI." The Eton seal has: "COLLEGII REGALIS" and not "COLLEGII REGVLVS," and Henry VI.'s seal "in absentia," not "SIGILLVM REGNINI," but "SIGILLVM REGIVM." The chapter on ecclesiastical seals "may," Mr. Bloom says, "fitly conclude with two mottoes—one from the seal of Ralph de Toton, Bishop of Carlisle, reads thus: 'VIRGO IH'V NVT'X RADVLPHO SIS PIA TVTRIX' (O Virgin, nurse of Jesus, to thy Ralph teach piety); the other from the counterseal of Bishop Walter—'HEC SCVLPTVA IMAT FINIS NO' PVGNA CORONAT' (This sculpture teaches the end not the battle crowns)."

That Mr. Bloom should translate "Radulpho sis pia tutrix" as "to thy Ralph teach piety" suggests that it is possible for a Master of Arts sadly to forget his Latin. Ralph de Toton should, by the way, be read as Ralph of Ireton. The translation of "hec sculptua imat" as "this sculpture teaches" is as bold a reading, but a reading of the inscription as "HEC SCVLPTVRA SONAT" supplies a better and more probable one. Mr. Bloom might well have delayed his book until he was more at ease in reading and translating such inscriptions. So many errors in a few lines do not give confidence.

Mr. Bloom has the courage to recommend his book to the student of costume, arms and armour and to the herald and genealogist. His own studies in these matters seem to have been of the slightest. The commentary upon the armour is the merest guesswork with misapplied words. He has forty times the need to speak of the embroidered caparisons of the knight's horse and in every case he calls them "bardings." Now the bards of a horse were defensive armour and "trappers" is the word Mr. Bloom should use. We are unable to guess at the meaning of the "fleur de lis vieux agneis" which Mr. Bloom finds on the "bardings" of Edward III.'s charger, but the horse carries many errors of Mr. Bloom, who calls the long curb or check of the bit "the snaffle" and the armour of the back of the neck the "poitral," a word which belongs to the bard of the chest. On his seal one Osbern son of Pons rides in mail and helmet, but, he having a hawk on fist, Mr. Bloom declares that he is "not in war panoply but in hawking array." With the dress of churchmen Mr. Bloom is hardly more familiar, for he defines the alb as distinctively the garment of a priest and the dalmatic as a sleeveless garment.

The student of armory will have no help from Mr. Bloom, yet some knowledge of the science should surely be acquired before one writes of seals, the half of which display arms. Mr. Bloom's statement that no one is found using a crest between Richard I. and Edward III. is a worthless guess, as several well-known seals might demonstrate. So is the reckless remark that "merchants were not at first allowed the use of proper coats of arms: indeed, the earliest instance known to the writer is that on the brass of William Grevell who died in 1401." The fancy of the heraldry books that some court or college had the power, in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, of granting and withholding the right to bear arms lingers stubbornly, but plenty of seals of those ages deny Mr. Bloom's assertion, and a writer on seals should have met with many such.

"It is not until the fourteenth century that the practice known as dimidiation [of shields of arms] occurs" is another haphazard statement of the same value, for "dimidiation," so-called, is peculiarly a primitive practice and ceases in the fourteenth century. When we note that, although his principal field of research has been amongst the Warwick seals, Mr. Bloom does not yet recognise the well-known shield of the Newburgh Earls of Warwick, guessing that it may be that of Mowbray, which it resembles in no particular, we have said enough to show that Mr. Bloom is in the wrong galaxy.

That so carelessly compiled a book should be seen amongst the "Antiquary's Books" as a work of reference for antiquaries makes one pity the fate of the science of archæology which must suffer these things.

Here is Mr. Bloom, without any adequate knowledge of armory, of armour, of costume or of inscriptions, putting forward in good faith a book which is nearly concerned with all these matters. What greeting would the reviews have for a book on chemistry or physiology, the author of which had started out with as scanty a qualification for his task?

OSWALD BARRON.

SWEETNESS—LONG DRAWN OUT

A German Pompadour. By MARIE HAY. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

THERE has been lately a rage for the memoirs of respectable or disreputable ladies of the eighteenth century, not unlike the fashion which rose at the same time for mezzotints from Sir Joshua's portraits of women. It was not necessary that they should have possessed remarkable minds or should have lived irreproachable lives. But it was essential that they should move in brilliant circles, should sweep through the world in satin and powder, and should charm their way from one splendid height to another by virtue of smiles and courtesies and little exquisite phrases which brought peers and princes to their knees. Their prosaic descendants were expected to do homage also at the mere recollection of those vanished charms. How far such a creature was possible it is scarcely fitting to ask; but if she lived at all, and lived by means of such graces as these, it must surely have been in the age when Sir Joshua painted her. But then the biographer must approach her with peculiar tact, for words pierce beneath paint, and the souls of Pompadours may look fairer upon the surface.

The difficulties of the task are great, we may admit; and Miss Marie Hay seems to have complicated them still further by the method which she has adopted in her "Extraordinary history of Wilhelmine von Grävenitz." It is a true story, dug, we are told, from official archives, but the facts briefly stated with "colourless reticence" by the lawyers have been expanded and embellished in Miss Hay's imagination till they are certainly not reticent, and there is plenty of colour, although it is not always in quite the right place. But her compromise between history and fiction is maintained throughout; she is always guiding herself by authentic facts, and her emotions are regulated by the documents at her side. And here lies the defect of the system. She cannot give her imagination free rein, and yet she may indulge it to such an extent that the reader does not know when he is reading history and when he is reading fiction. This is an awkward frame of mind, and the artistic merits of the book suffer from the compromise. It is easy to suggest that the figure of Wilhelmine invited treatment in one of two ways: she might have made an interesting study if her biographer had kept strictly to the truth and allowed her to speak in her own words, or she might have posed for a very picturesque portrait in the manner of Sir Joshua. But here we have a composite production, where the truth has the vagueness of fiction and the fiction is diluted with fact.

Wilhelmine was the sister of a courtier at the palace of Duke Eberhard Ludwig of Wirtemberg. The book opens in the year 1705 when this gentleman, finding that he cannot afford to live there any longer, sends for his sister to captivate the Duke, dethrone the old favourite, and raise her own family to the heights with her. She is a poor girl, of great beauty, with the eyes of a witch and the voice of a nightingale, and her triumph is instant and complete.

"Ah Mademoiselle [says the Duke at their first meeting] will you leave the Duke here on the balcony, and come and look at the stars with the ridiculous poet-fellow?" . . . Who could resist him, this man with the pleading eyes and deep, strong voice?

Wilhelmine, at least, had no intention of resisting him, and the intimacy, begun poetically under the stars, was continued in all its extravagant and familiar phases for some twenty years. It is not difficult in the early stages to be thrilled in the right places by all the cumbersome ceremonial of the little German court: the eye is pleased with the pageantry of dance and festival, and the ear is flattered with the "Monseigneurs" and "Highnesses" that drop from the lips of profoundly obeisant great ladies and gentlemen. Wilhelmine has the gift of appearing suddenly in the doorway, robed in the "Grävenitz yellow"; all eyes are fixed upon her and she achieves some triumph or passes unmoved with her snake glance through some terrible insult. But there comes a time when the sensational moment fails to thrill, and the sarcasm of the outraged ladies, which generally takes the form of suggesting that the favourite has had the small-pox very badly, is not sufficiently pointed to draw our blood. To make the interest endure when the brilliant surface has worn thin, we want to feel that Wilhelmine was a high-spirited, romantic woman in spite of her morals, that the duke had some lovable quality that touched her heart and not merely her ambition; in short, that the whole set of decorous eighteenth-century figures were driven by human passions, and were not the puppets of some elaborate Court machine. But in spite of many picturesque passages it is difficult to move with any swiftness through the long-drawn vicissitudes of the favourite's career. They tend to repeat themselves and to twist and turn with languid motion in the familiar channels. A novelist here would have been at liberty to select and epitomise; but Miss Hay, with the burden of documents on her shoulders, follows the story patiently, and engrafts upon the bare outline a lavish but indiscriminate wealth of description and conversation which seems not to be spun from the legitimate source of inspiration in her brain, but to be the spurious outcome of research in official archives. It does not reveal character, that is, but encumbers it.

It is enough to say that the favourite rose to be Prime Minister as well as mistress, accumulated lands till the peasants called her the "Land-despoiler," and surrounded herself with splendours of marble and satin that were to rival Versailles. But it remained a German copy till the end. We catch glimpses of her beneath all this shifting mass of finery, and of other figures more visionary still, but they move in a drifting atmosphere where the laws that bind live men and women can scarcely be applied. It is not possible to try their conduct by any ordinary standard, nor does their biographer attempt to pronounce the moral verdict. Wilhelmine falls, and we read how in the end:

A soft evening breeze came stealing round her. The long Spring twilight faded, night drew near—and the Grävenitz turned away. "Farewell," she said aloud, "the night comes. Farewell Spring."

And is that the voice of the dismissed courtesan or of her biographer?

"Like a faint fragrance of faded rose-leaves," we read, "a breath of this woman's charm seems to cling and elusively to peep out of the curt record of her crimes." But the ordinary reader will question whether the record of Wilhelmine might not give off a more pungent odour to other nostrils; and still more will he doubt whether this vagrant air is potent enough to steep three hundred and fifty odd pages in its fragrance. A magazine article or a sonnet were the proper vessel for such sweetness.

HISTORY AND A SENSE OF HUMOUR

La Question Biblique au XX^e Siècle. PAR ALBERT HOUTIN (Paris: E. Nourry, 4 fr.)

THOSE who have read any of the Abbé Houtin's previous books will know that he combines a scrupulous accuracy in matters of fact with great facility and clearness of expression, a delightful style and a strong sense of humour. His sense of humour has, indeed, been rather too strong for the taste of his ecclesiastical superiors; it is said that the table of contents was largely responsible for the placing on the Index of "La Question Biblique chez les Catholiques de France au XIX^e Siècle," to which the present volume is a sequel. The new book is not confined to France; it begins with a short but admirable summary of the progress of biblical criticism in the various Christian Churches during the first three years of the present century, and a later very interesting chapter is devoted to the present state of the question in England. The mass of information that M. Houtin has managed to compress into some two hundred and fifty octavo pages is as wonderful as the fact that he has succeeded in giving so much information without being dull. The book is one which every one interested in the subject will read for pleasure and keep for reference.

The author confines himself almost entirely to a record of facts: when he does comment on them, his comments are usually of great assistance in their elucidation. There are, however, one or two passages showing signs of haste, which M. Houtin might with advantage revise in the future editions which will certainly be demanded. He seems to misunderstand M. Loisy's use of the terms "une réalité purement surnaturelle" and "un fait surnaturel" (p. 65) by which M. Loisy means, not a phenomenon alleged to have a supernatural cause, but a reality above and beyond phenomena and, therefore, in the nature of things, not to be demonstrated by the evidence of the senses. And, when M. Loisy says that history "n'atteint pas le fond des choses," he certainly (as the context indicates) does not mean that the historian cannot thoroughly investigate a phenomenon and ascertain its causes, but that history, like science, is concerned with phenomena and not with the Reality that underlies them. M. Houtin's treatment of these points would suggest to a reader unacquainted with M. Loisy's works that the latter holds the belief that a phenomenon can be "true for faith" and untrue in history. Of course, M. Houtin does not intend to suggest this, and, for that reason, we hope that he will revise this passage. We do not quite follow M. Houtin's meaning when he says that the modern spirit will never be content to regard the question of the divinity of Christ as insoluble from the historical point of view. Surely history is, in the nature of things, unable to solve such a problem; it cannot even decide finally whether Jesus was conscious of divinity, but can only say whether His sayings suggest that He was so conscious.

These, however, are but small criticisms of a book in which there is very little to criticise; and they do not in the least impair its value as a record. Some of the facts that the author records are both new and amazing. The account in chapter xi. of a course of lectures delivered at the Roman seminary by Father Hetzenhauer, professor of scriptural exegesis there, must be read to be appreciated. The worthy Professor's account of the origin of the devotion called the Angelus is an astonishing example of the workings of the theological mind; it is incredible that such a person should be regarded by the Pope in the twentieth century as the best man who could be found in Europe to instruct the clerical students of his own diocese. For the Gregorian University, the principal University of the Catholic world, Pius X. has selected Father Delattre, S.J., whose motto in regard to biblical exegesis is: "Il faut tout prendre ou tout laisser." M. Houtin gives some examples of this gentleman's lectures, which are only less astounding than those of Father Hetzenhauer.

The last chapter, on "La vraie question," is in some respects the most valuable in the book. M. Houtin, after pointing out that critics have no a priori objection to miracles, proceeds to give a perfectly candid statement of the critical analysis of the narratives of the Virgin Birth, the Resurrection and the Ascension. Hitherto, the critical objections to these narratives have been almost entirely shirked by the defenders of the traditional view; it is high time that they were faced and answered, if they can be. During the last few years the criticism of the New Testament and of these narratives in particular has made enormous strides, and the clergy of all Churches had better make up their minds that the orthodox belief will not survive unless it can be shown to be compatible with historical honesty. They will nowhere find a clearer statement of what they have to meet than in M. Houtin's last chapter.

THE PERSONAL NOTE

Life of Descartes. By ELIZABETH S. HALDANE. (Murray, 15s. net.)

IN theology there are ever present two contradictory tendencies. One school attempts wholly to deify and the other wholly to humanise the Founder of Christianity. The same conflict of aims is observable in the world of biography. One writer puts his hero on a pedestal. For him genius is exceptional, isolated and unique, even to the tying or the not tying of its shoe-laces. Another delights to show his hero in shirt-sleeves and not infrequently ends by obscuring his real distinction under a tedious mass of personal and ephemeral trivialities. It is, indeed, a difficult task to hit the happy mean between the cothurnus and carpet slippers. If Miss Haldane's "Life of Descartes" smacks rather of a description of genius in a dressing-gown, what it loses in breadth of outlook it certainly gains in possessing the personal note, no small merit when we consider how comparatively uneventful was the philosopher's history. The autobiographical fragment contained in the "Discours de la Méthode" is a marvellous mosaic of phrases which for the most part have become historic. To develop it into a readable volume of near four hundred pages is no inconsiderable feat. Miss Haldane's success may best be understood by comparing her attempt at expansion with Farrer's unhappy inflation of the Gospel story. We attribute her success to the way in which she "mothers" her hero from start to finish, and also to her judicious handling of the epoch in which he lived. It is one of the besetting sins of the modern writer to drag in long biographical details about people of the day because they possibly met Descartes or another at a dinner-party. Here the times are made use of to form a proper background, and nothing is lugged in for its own sake. It cannot be said of Miss Haldane's hero that he has elsewhere his setting or that the setting itself "cometh from afar."

One of the most interesting points in Descartes's history, and certainly the most debateable, is his attitude towards the religion of his birth. Was he a sincere Catholic? Miss Haldane gives him the benefit of the doubt, and we are inclined to agree with her. We think his efforts to obtain the approbation of the Jesuits for his views were dictated by a judicious desire to hedge, coupled with a genuine wish to retain the goodwill of his former teachers, which seems very natural if we bear in mind his happy school days as a kind of gentleman commoner at La Flèche. We look on him, as we look on Erasmus, as a kind of Liberal Catholic. Few realise the extent to which free thought was permissible in the Church of the thirteenth century, which could contain in its bosom a Roger Bacon. Its traditions were by no means at an end in the seventeenth century. As for the charge of inconsistency, many a good Christian makes jettison to-day, consciously or unconsciously, of part of the Scriptures. He none the less would be highly indignant, and rightly so, were the name of Christian denied him.

In spite of Miss Haldane's careful analysis of the philosophic work of Descartes, we think the majority of her readers will hardly realise from the book itself how Descartes was to a very large extent, as Huxley said, the father of modern thought. Still, if the author had been more interested in the philosopher, it is quite possible she would not have given us such a breezy and chatty description of the man. "You cannot have it both ways" is a saw of proverbial philosophy which is not infrequently true, and those who want the philosopher will be able to find plenty about him elsewhere, thanks to the lengthy bibliography that Miss Haldane has appended to her work.

A WELSH MYSTIC

The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne. Edited by BERTRAM DOBELL. Second edition. (Dobell, 3s. 6d.)

WE must congratulate Mr. Dobell on the appearance of a second impression of Traherne's poetical works. He deserved success, and he has won it. We now look forward to the promised edition of the poet's prose writings. For since the publication in 1903 of some verses which Traherne left in manuscript he has become a figure of importance in the history of the literature of the Restoration. His is a strange fate. After a lapse into oblivion lasting some hundreds of years, he has obtained as a poet a shadow of the fame which he prayed that he might achieve in his lifetime as a prophet. It seems to us, however, that Traherne still remains more interesting in his character as a prophet than in his character as a poet. In the first he was a man of genius; in the second, only a man of talent. It was in his personality that his real power resided. Uniting, in a singular manner, the insight and innocence of a child with the enthusiasm and lucidity of mind of a man, he reduced philosophy to religion, and religion into a message of "joy in widest commonality spread." He was a thinker with few ideas, but these ideas were by him transformed into feelings and built into the substance of his soul. In fine, he was a fanatic, but his fanaticism was of an exquisite, simple and beautiful order. He seems to shine through the dark and troubled atmosphere of his age like a bright and tranquil incarnation of the spirit of English mysticism of the earlier part of the seventeenth century.

He was the son of a poor shoemaker of Hereford, in which town he was born about the year 1636. In 1652 he came up to Oxford, intent upon bettering his position in life. But at the age of twenty-one he left the University, and, abandoning his worldly ambitions, "chose to live upon ten pounds a year and to go in leather clothes and feed upon bread and water," so that he might spend all his days in the search after felicity. "Seated among the silent trees and woods and hills" of Credenhill in Herefordshire, he meditated for ten years, and then came, in the service of the Lord Keeper, to London, where he died in 1674 just as he was endeavouring to found a religion of the spirit. No doubt, even had he lived, he would have failed as the Cambridge Platonists had done before him, for his point of view was more speculative and daring than theirs. In the matter of politics he was an Anglican priest of the old school: he held that the sacred person of the king was the connecting link between justice, the outer law, and religion, the inner law. In the matter of dogma, however, he was a mystic, for whom the doctrine of the fall of man was merely a symbol of the degradation suffered by every individual soul in the passage from childhood to manhood. This was, indeed, the principle of his philosophy. Like Henry More and Vaughan, he was a born Platonist. The origin and source of his mysticism were his vivid recollections of the brightness, innocency and beauty of his infancy. For him the poor shoemaker's house in Hereford ever remained the Eden where in the morning of life he had walked with God:

Those pure and virgin apprehensions I had in my infancy, and that divine light wherewith I was born, are the best unto this day wherein I can see the universe. . . . Certainly Adam in Paradise had not more sweet and curious apprehensions of the world than I when I was a child.

All appeared new and strange at first, inexpressibly rare and delightful and beautiful. I was a little stranger which at my entrance into the world was saluted and surrounded with innumerable joys. My knowledge was Divine; I knew by intuition those things which since my apostacy I collected again by the highest reason. . . . All things were spotless and pure and glorious; yea, and infinitely mine and joyful and precious. . . . I was entertained like an angel with the works of God in their splendour and glory; I saw all in the peace of Eden. . . .

The corn was orient and immortal wheat which never should be reaped nor was ever sown. I thought it had stood from everlasting to everlasting. The dust and stones of the streets were as precious as gold: the gates were at first the end of the world. The green trees when I saw them first through one of the gates transported and ravished me; their sweetness and unusual beauty made my heart to leap, and almost mad with ecstasy, they were such strange and wonderful things. The Men! O what venerable and reverend creatures did the aged seem! Immortal Cherubims! And young men glittering and sparkling angels, and maids strange seraphic pieces of life and beauty! Boys and girls tumbling in the street were moving jewels: I knew not that they were born or should die. But all things abided eternally as they were in their proper places. Eternity was manifest in the Light of the Day, and something infinite behind everything appeared, which talked with my expectation and moved my desire. The City seemed to stand in Eden, or to be built in Heaven. The streets were mine, the temple was mine, the people were mine, their clothes and gold and silver were mine, as much as their sparkling eyes, fair skins, and ruddy faces. The skies were mine, and so were the sun and moon and stars, and all the world was mine; and I the only spectator and enjoyer of it.

Traherne is a finer writer of prose than of verse, but even his poetry acquires colour and music whenever he relates in it the adventures of his soul in that golden age of life when:

The world's unwither'd countenance
Is bright as on creation day.

Though he never succeeds in rivalling the best things in Blake, there is something incomparable in the general quality of his poems of child-life. Recovering, in a sort of rapture, the pure, untroubled vision of infancy, he gazed again on the kingdom of the earth with the eyes of a child and found that it was the kingdom of heaven. This is the message of joy which is interwoven with the fragments of his philosophy, and with his discourse on "Christian Ethics."

The latter work is the only one on the subject which he completed, and it is an admirable instance of the original manner in which he entered upon his task. It shows that, amid all his enthusiasm, he maintained a sane, steady and lucid temper of mind. The question of morality was the weak point in his position, and this he endeavoured, first of all, to strengthen. The common defect of mysticism is that it is extremely individualistic. Instead of binding a man more closely to his kind in a community of love and work and worship, it transcends all moral laws and social obligations, and ends in a passive contemplativeness. Traherne condemned this apathy, as he called it, and traced it to its source in the philosophy of the Alexandrians. In his view, true felicity was attainable neither by wisdom nor by a passionless abstraction of the mind, but by a spirit of active and universal joy such as that by which the senses of a child were animated. He regarded the reason, the imagination and the will itself as mere acts of the soul, of which the essence was its infinite capacity for delight. It was as an object of joy that man was necessary to God and God to man: and as objects of joy men were necessary to men. The world, also, had been created as an object of joy. Only the vicious customs of mankind and the diseases of the will consequent thereon came between man and his felicity.

That all we see is ours, and every one
Possessor of the whole; that every man
Is like a God Incarnate on the Throne,
Even like the first for whom the world began . . .

That all may happy be, each one most blest,
Both in himself and others; all most high,
While all by each, and each by all possess,
Are intermutual joys beneath the sky.

This shows a wise contrivance, and discovers
Some great Creator sitting on the Throne,
That so disposeth things for all His lovers,
That every one might reign like God alone.

That is the sum of Traherne's philosophy. It is founded on a child-like faith; but was it not said of children that of such were the kingdom of heaven? We have, perhaps, more knowledge of the world than he: we have certainly far less capacity for joy.

IN A MEADOW

O God, I thank You for the Sunlight's gold
That bids my fancies with the rose unfold.
O God, I thank You for the Wood, that sighs
Its magic out, in rustling symphonies.
For purple Flag, and silver Meadow-Sweet,
Celestial poems, crushed beneath our feet.

O, tender God, what gifts I owe to You—
Earth's deepest green, and heaven's divinest blue.
Now solemn grows my heart—her discords cease,
She quaffs the stillness, and inhales the peace.
Slays her false grief, and sheds her unreal care,
And in the vast Enchantment bows in prayer!

THE QUARTERLIES

In a phrase that has often been used before, the July number of the Quarterly is varied. "The Cry of the Children" is a judicial summary of legislation for juveniles during the reign of Queen Victoria. If baby-farming is to be dealt with effectively, the reviewer does not see how much inquiry is required into the management of voluntary lying-in hospitals. "Geoffrey of Monmouth" is a pleasant exaltation of the writer of that name purely and simply as a romancist. The article on "Northumberland" is the least satisfactory in the number. It is evident that the writer has plenty of enthusiasm, and yet he scarcely writes like a native. His observations are practically confined to Bamborough and Dunstanburgh; when he wanders from them it is to commit such extraordinary mistakes as to speak of Flodden Field being between the Twizell and the Till—it lies between the Cheviots and the Till. Nor, at any rate, does he show any possession of that power that would have enabled him to suggest the peculiar charm of that land of "feud and fray." He does not so much as mention Lindisfarne with its sands and castles and ruins, and his easy eloquence gives no hint of that broken coast where the air still seems to retain a whispering echo of priest's chant and clansman's slogan. Wild scenery united with the most romantic ballad literature ought to have inspired something better than this. Though the author disclaims it, "Modern British Art" comes perilously near being a defence of the Royal Academy and an apology for "anecdotes in paint." He wishes to see "the intellectual and emotional sides of art resume the high place which they held during the periods of the past." And the apologist of a sister art in "The Literature of Egotism" does not score a more brilliant success. The passages selected for quotation are almost invariably commonplace. For example, he transcribes the extraordinary discovery that "the gift of expression is something very different indeed from mere garrulousness." It is a pity to see a Quarterly Reviewer ignorant of what should be the qualities of good prose. Mr. R. S. Rait writes ingeniously of John Knox, though with a pronounced bias. He fails to see that, for good or ill, John Knox was begotten by the very genius of Scotland, and that his work was to deepen the national characteristics.

In the Edinburgh Review the most literary article is that which deals with Alfred De Musset. In it the connection between the poet and George Sand is clearly and logically analysed. It is summed up in the following sentences:

No question here of whose the blame, whose the wrongdoing. We are face to face with the elemental facts, simple and human: a man in his youth, a woman in her maturity, of radically opposed instincts, have met; they have loved, they have wounded each other to the core; they have arranged to part, as if the fibres of two lives so closely interknitted—call the connection by what name we may—can be severed at will with a knife. They have learnt too late that there is no court of divorce at whose bar the tie which bound the man to the woman he loved and wronged, which bound the woman to the lad to whose passion she had responded in tenderness and trust, could be so facily dissolved. They had to learn that man rivets such bonds, but that it takes something over which man has no dominion to annul them, the link may be broken, but the brand of the forging is on the soul.

The opening review of the number deals with Lord Randolph Churchill, and is on the whole a good character-study. In "A Representative Philosopher" we have a fine study of Descartes and the part he played in the evolution of human thought. One of the papers which it is difficult to take seriously is that on "Rationalism and Apologetic." The writer begins gaily enough with a promise to apply rationalism to religious opinions, but the article resembles a man beating the air; it wants backbone. Instead of solid argument the writer floods us with a mass of rhetoric. The following is a fair example of his style:

The material heaven of mediæval poets and painters, for instance, strikes a false note for us of to-day. The trim parterres and formal garden-paths of the Primitives have given place to the wind swept spaces of eternity; their demure saints and little piping angels to shadowy forms, vast and indeterminate, embodying a more than human intelligence, force, and will. The sense of limit irks us; the city that lieth foursquare is exchanged for the flaming walls of the world; and these again open and disclose endless vistas of aspiration and activity.

'O to be up and doing!'

A listless inert eternity were monotonous. Knowledge, love, achievement call, and we follow—to be deaf were death. It is not necessary, perhaps it is not even desirable, that all who hear it should move in the same direction. Temperament, circumstance, and heredity attach a man to this or that religious society or lead him to take up this or that form of religious activity. The essential thing is that it shall be religious. And this is not to be taken for granted or decided on surface grounds.

Its inconclusiveness is very apparent. Another article well worth reading is that on "Marino Falier," though, curiously enough, the writer omits Mr. Swinburne's play from his list of the books. The political articles are of the usual character.

THE POEMS AND PROPHECIES OF THOMAS LAKE HARRIS

ALMOST as keen a controversy has raged over the merits of the literary productions of the late Thomas Lake Harris as raged over the merits of his religious doctrines. Just as some, who disliked his creed, pronounced him a charlatan, and just as others, who admired his faith, hailed him as a Prophet, so the two extremes were found among the critics of his books. One set unreservedly pronounced them to be ravings and worthless humbug; the other set unhesitatingly acclaimed them as the products of an original genius, and compared them with the loftiest flights of Milton and Shelley. Such differences are irreconcilable, and the proper course to take is to go direct to the volumes themselves and form an independent judgment.

A volume of sermons and two volumes of poems came into my hands in 1891 at the time the discussion on Thomas Lake Harris and Laurence Oliphant was at its height. I obtained permission from a member of the Brotherhood of the New Life to quote some of these poems in a London journal; later I was requested to deliver an address in St. James's Hall and say something of Harris's literary as well as his religious influence. I mention these personal circumstances because as a result sufficient interest was manifested in one who had been loosely termed "the unknown Prophet," to incite the Brotherhood to a public issue of his compositions. Accordingly, in the early part of 1892 three books, which had been exclusively kept for the reading and study of the members of the Harris fraternity, were published anew from a London office: "The New Republic; Prospects, Dangers, Duties, and Safeties of the Times;" "Brotherhood of the New Life: Its Fact, Law, Method, and Purpose;" "The Great Republic: A Poem of the Sun." These were followed in due course by: "Lyra Triumphalis: People Songs, Ballads, and Marches;" "Battle Bells: Verse-studies in Social Humanity;" "God's Breath in Man and in Humane Society: Law, Process, and Result of Divine-Natural Respiration." But these only represented a very small portion of Harris's literary activity. From 1854 he wrote for public or private circulation, so far as I can compute, thirty-five volumes. Such is the formal record of an enterprise which created a peculiar interest at the time, but, I fear, was of no immediate gain. The British public was already prejudiced against the man who had been vehemently assailed for exercising a sinister influence over Laurence Oliphant; and his method of address, with a new and somewhat difficult phraseology, rendered it impossible for him to win a wide and appreciative hearing. Dr. Walter Lewin in a calm and unimpassioned review which appeared in the ACADEMY said that "there was enough in Mr. Harris's works to repay honest critical study in the stimulus of new ideas or old ideas re-stated. We are glad," he added, "to read what he has to say by way of criticism of things as they are, and of exposition of the ideal towards which he would lead mankind." This was in sharp contrast to another critic who quoted a verse which displeased him, and on the strength of it dismissed all Harris's writings as "senseless rhodomontade," "indescribable stupidity," "ridiculous egotism," "worthless nonsense," and "ludicrous lucubrations." When we remember that Laurence Oliphant himself had found these compositions "noble and inspiring," and that for forty years they have attracted intellectual giants like Horace Greeley, Charles Dana, and that remarkable poet, Edward Markham, the problem of their real merit and value becomes the more difficult to solve. That they possess conspicuous defect as well as conspicuous excellence, I for one, as an earnest student of them, should not hesitate to confess; that they are occasionally uncouth and obscure must also be admitted; while it is obvious that to the uninitiated many of the statements must seem mysterious and many of the ideas grotesque. But, when all this is admitted, justice demands the admission also that the prose works are charged with vital power and the poetry infused with true charm and beauty.

It is impossible, of course, to dissociate Harris's literary works from his religious doctrines. We trace through them, in fact, the growth and development of that peculiar form of Christian faith with which his name will be linked; we hear the strengthened note of confidence, as time goes on, that he was reaching his goal and attaining that culminating triumph which was to be marked by human immortality. Moreover, he was a social reformer, and in prose and verse he set forth his Utopian ideas of social regeneration. He dwelt in an Arcadia of his creation. He worked out a system of democracy. Tolstoy might have joined hands with him in this, for both literally interpreted the Sermon on the Mount and harked back to "primitive Christianity." However deluded Thomas Lake Harris may have been, his sincerity can scarcely be questioned and his absolute purity of mind is attested by all who met him. Of course, he was a dreamer, a man of constant visions; and his strangely beautiful ideal is figured in that picture-poem "The Great Republic: A Poem of the Sun":

A great republic built aloft,
In middle splendour of the Sun's dominions:
Thither, when slumber with its kisses soft
Sealed the dim eyes, my spirit plumed its pinions.

If thou hast trod in crypts, where old Tradition
Carves talismans and amulets of bones;
If thou hast vainly fought the red Perdition,
That slays the people from its hundred thrones;
If thou art cursed by man, cursed for the bringing
Of truth and love: then listen to my singing.

He looked forward to the establishment of a new kingdom "based and built on inspirations," when all people would enjoy a common faith, a common hope, and a common energy for the common uprise. This Republic was only to be accessible by "divinity in fitness"—"its hand must lift every man above its accidents and its bosom upbear every woman from her misfortunes." Only men who had matriculated in the University of Labour would be prepared for the supreme evolution. "Education," he said, in a characteristically pregnant sentence, "is through agonies."

Given the men, evolutionised into the spirit and passion of the service; given a quickening of the masses; given the hour of the opportune, and it is no more a matter of difficulty to organise the New Republic, throned in the structures of fitting environment, crowned with the splendid lights of a supreme human intelligence, than it was for the Argonauts of '48 to open the treasures of the palaces, and for their successors to establish the present statehood.

I extract this passage from one of his prose deliverances as a specimen of his style as well as of his ideas.

But it is in his poems that we come not only to the most glowing outbursts but to another phenomenon. These works were nearly all written whilst he was in a state of trance. Of his "Lyric of Morning Land," running to some six thousand five hundred lines, he related that it was dictated to him in thirty hours "after the archetypal ideas had been internally wrought by spiritual agency." During that period he was in a state "analogous to physical death," and on emerging he found he had produced the poem that was "bred in heaven with breath-like bridal-blooms." Therefore he could write with the greater confidence that:

This book can not be slain;
'Twill live, 'twill walk the world and wing the air,
Surviving every pompous priestly fane
The weary earth groans under, loth to bear.

Dear shall it be to Lovers; like a lamp
With crimson radiance, rose-perfumed and fed,
That guides from earth's low caverns drear and damp,
To where, in heaven, true hearts are angel-wed.

Take it, O world, it is an angel boon,
Dear-purchased by the hand that bore it down.

In his lines on "The Spiritual Ministry of Night," in the song, "Love is Endless," and in the beautiful address to Sleep:

In dreams the sails of thought, unfurled,
Waft us like barques where angels keep Close-veiled within the unknown seas
Their watch; to saint upon his knees
Great God! how near thou comest down

—we assuredly find him rising to a high plane. His story of the Sun:

With all its splendid grace
A shadow from the Almighty face, revealed the boldness of his imagination; indeed, it might well be complained that he showed too much daring in his themes and his treatment. But his direct messages to mankind were as simple as they were wholesome. "Grow perfect in the sanity of life," he said.

Grow perfect! bide thy time! in thine own being Solve by an actual test the problems vast
That vex mankind; and, if the years are fleeing,
Wait patiently . . .
Be chaste, be true, be wholly consecrated
To virgin right. So shall thy soul unchain
The powers that for the perfect man have waited.

Purity was his watchword. The innocence of the child was to be imitated, both in life-deeds and in faith, as when

Our fathers in the golden age of yore
Found Bibles in the daisies at the door.

He was a hymn-writer whose lines have found their way into more than one volume for congregations that knew little of the man from whom they emanated. His "Battle Bells" and "Lyra Triumphalis," intended to stimulate social reform, seem to me to be subtly impressive. In a note of "Greeting" the author explained that whilst his vocation was that of "a practical industrialist, calling forth from the good soil its corn, oil and wine," he had another function: "Intellectual ministry to the People, a helper in social labours."

It was the custom of Thomas Lake Harris to send constant messages to the fraternity on events of the day and to counsel them in regard to their own attitude. Despite his seclusion, he was fully abreast with the times, and his comments were those of a shrewd, discerning man. He was an omnivorous reader of all the best authors, a lover both of books and of art. A visitor to Fountain Grove found the home of the Brotherhood one of bewildering beauty:

So many lofty rooms open into each other by archways, and there are pictures, pictures everywhere in endless profusion. The walls are white, touched with a little gold, and in most of the archways hang portières of black and gold or deep-red. The rooms are lined with pictures; they stand around on top of the low bookshelves, and even on the floor. Most of them are very old, some dating back three hundred years.

In his more technical works, particularly his later ones relating to the discovery of "the divine breath in man," Harris created a form of expression that admittedly is very difficult to understand. He required new terms, and he manufactured them. It needs a special education to know exactly what he meant by "one-twainness," or to follow the profound and complex argument in the five hundred and eighty paragraphs explanatory of the "opening of the spirit of the human structure to breathe down its mental formation, thence down into its passionless formation, and thence through the passionate into the extreme lungs of other breathing organs of the extreme corporeal image." But it is not necessary to plunge into this seething mass of words to understand the main doctrine which Harris epitomised in this one sentence: "God is discoverable: the pure in heart can find him." Better still, in this hour when a kindly thought can be given by all to the dead man who had dreamed of perpetual youth, to think of the haunting music of those lines of invocation in which he touched the sweetest of chords:

If thou hast hope, e'en now, that man, victorious
O'er tyranny and infamy, shall be Himself a temple of that Life all-glorious
Who smiles through earth and gives eternity;
Or seest the beautiful Ideal winging
Her flight below: then listen to my singing.

If thou art flushed with Love's immortal passion;
If thou art yearning for its bliss divine;
Ay, if thy scattered locks with age are ashen,
And slow thy pulses in the dim decline;
Once more inhale the fragrance that is clinging
To my white robes: and listen to my singing.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

ROBERT BARCLAY

How many persons now alive have read:

An Apology for the True Christian Divinity, as the same is held forth and preached by the People called in Scorn Quakers?

I forbear to quote the whole title-page, which, after the manner of the seventeenth century, is prolix in the extreme; and I suppose I need hardly add that I do not purpose to deal with the theological aspect of the Apology. Not being myself one of the People called in Scorn Quakers, I have never read through the body of the work; and, indeed, I should never have read even the prefatory address to King Charles II., but for the accident of my being lineally descended from Robert Barclay of Ury, the author of the Apology.

When I did read the Address, the first thing that arrested my attention was its masterly tact. Quakers, as every one knows, proscribe all titles of honour and phrases of compliment, yet there is not a line or a sentence in the Address which might not have been written or spoken by the most courtly of courtiers. I do not lay stress on the skill with which the personal pronoun, Thou, is used, because in English, ancient or modern, Thou is the pronoun by which the Deity is addressed. The word, accordingly, implies no familiarity; indeed, I suspect that the modern Quaker bad grammar, "thee" for "thou" in the second person nominative singular, may be an effort to avoid addressing the creature by the same word whereby the Creator is addressed. The French, we all know, address le bon Dieu as vous—or rather, French Roman Catholics do; for French Protestants use the scriptural tu. But to return to Barclay and the Address to the King. It begins thus:

Unto Charles II., King of Great Britain and the Dominions thereunto belonging, Robert Barclay [I omit some theological phrases] wisheth Health and Salvation.

Here we have no "Majesty" nor any allusion to Divine Right; but the Kingship of Charles II. and his title to rule over Great Britain and the dominions thereof are unreservedly acknowledged. It is curious that Ireland is not mentioned by name; for, as it happens, parts of Ireland became great strongholds of Quakerism, and there are probably at least as many descendants of Robert Barclay in Ireland as in Scotland at the present day. The Address continues:

As the Conditions of Kings and Princes puts them in a Station more obvious to the View and Observation of the World than that of other men, of whom (as Cicero observes) neither any Word or Action can be obscure; so are those Kings, during whose appearance upon the Stage of this World it pleaseth the Great King of Kings singularly to make known unto men the wonderful Steps of His Unsearchable Providence, more signally observed and their Lives and Actions more diligently remarked and inquired into by Posterity; especially if those things be such as not only relate to the outward Transactions of this World, but also are signalized by the Manifestation or Revelation of the Knowledge of God in matters Spiritual and Religious. . . .

I must needs confess that this preamble sets out with a hazy bit of grammar; the whom in the first sentence may have the words "other men" for antecedent, as well as the words "Kings and Princes"; but the reader need not be misled. The style of the paragraph generally, if stilted, is grand and dignified, but the next paragraph is finer still:

Among all these Transactions, which it hath pleased God to permit, for the Glory of His Power, and the Manifestation of His Wisdom and Providence, no Age furnisheth us with things so strange and marvellous whether with respect to matters Civil or Religious, as these that have fallen out within the compass of Thy time; who though Thou be not yet arrived at the Fiftieth Year of Thy Age, hast yet been a Witness of stranger things than many Ages before produced. So that whether we respect those various Troubles wherein Thou found'st Thyself engaged while scarce got out of Thy Infancy; the many different Afflictions, wherewith Men of Thy Circumstances are often unacquainted; the strange and unparallel'd Fortune that befel Thy Father; Thy own narrow Escape, and Banishment following thereupon, with the very great improbability of Thy ever Returning, at least without very much Pains and tedious Combatings; or finally, the incapacity Thou wert under to accomplish such a Design, considering the Strength of those that had possessed themselves of Thy Throne, and the Terror they had inflicted upon Foreign States; and yet that after all this, Thou should'st be Restored without stroke of Sword, the help or assistance of Foreign States, or the contrivance and work of Humane [sic] Policy. All these do sufficiently declare that it is the Lord's Doing, which, as it is marvellous in our Eyes, so it will justly be a matter of Wonder and Astonishment to the Generations to come. . . .

I here again omit some theological allusions.

Now, I am not concerned to deny that these sentences are prolix and involved; we who have been brought up on the crisp terseness of Macaulay may be pardoned if such sentences make us stare and gasp. But Milton himself was prolix and involved; nay, a hundred years later, Johnson was prolix and involved. What I would ask attention to is the evidence, which stares us in the face in every line of this harangue, that the author is a scholar, and is moreover a scholar who has been nurtured upon some early translation of the Bible. Not necessarily King James's Bible, which we now call the Authorised Version; in fact, in the body of the Apology there are texts taken from some other translation.

Barclay is very cautious that his Address to the King shall not be mistaken for what is commonly called a Dedication. He writes:

As it is inconsistent with the Truth I bear, so it is far from me to use this Epistle as an Engine to flatter Thee, the usual design of such Works; and therefore I can neither Dedicate it to Thee nor crave Thy Patronage, as if thereby I might have more Confidence to present it to the World, or be more hopeful of its success.

The rest of the paragraph of which these are the opening lines is wholly theological, and I have quoted these lines merely to show the sturdy independence of Barclay's character. I claim for him that he is a great man of letters, and part of the evidence I adduce is that while asserting the simplicity of Quaker diction, he never loses sight either of dignity or of courtesy. The concluding paragraphs of the Address are probably the finest.

There is no King in the World who can so experimentally testify of God's Providence and Goodness; neither is there any who rules so many free People, so many true Christians; which thing renders Thy Government more Honourable, Thyself more Considerable, than the Accession of many nations filled with slavish and superstitious Souls.

Thou hast tasted of Prosperity and Adversity; thou know'st what it is to be banished Thy Native Country, to be Over-ruled as well as to Rule and sit upon the Throne; and being oppressed Thou hast reason to know how hateful the Oppressor is both to God and Man. If after all these Warnings and Advertisements Thou dost not turn unto the Lord with all Thy Heart; but forget him who remembered Thee in Thy distress, and give up Thyself to follow Lust and Vanity. Surely great will be thy condemnation.

Against which Snare, as well as the Temptation of those that may or do feed Thee and prompt Thee to Evil, the most Excellent and Prevalent Remedy will be to apply thyself to that Light of Christ which shineth in Thy Conscience, which neither can nor will flatter Thee, nor suffer Thee to be at ease in Thy Sins; but doth and will deal plainly and faithfully with Thee, as those that are Followers thereof have also done.

Here we have none of the coarse vituperation with which John Knox had assailed King Charles's great grandmother, Mary Queen of Scots. And yet the Address to the King is dated "the 25th of the month called November, in the year 1675"—Barclay having apparently so far conformed to the usage of the world as to call the month by its Latin name. It is just as well he did so; for, if he had described it by a number, the state of the calendar just then was such that we might not have known whether it was new or old style. But this is a digression. In 1675 the Court of Charles II. was at its height as a hotbed of scandals. Barclay, however, was too good a Christian to indulge in railing accusations—too well bred a gentleman to use language other than courteous—and too great a master of English to need vituperation for the sake of emphasis. His stately periods had really more point than the scolding of the Puritan preacher. But Barclay was courteous where Knox was coarse; and Knox left no such monument as the Apology. Moreover, although he did not convert the King, he so far prevailed with him as to procure indulgences for the Quaker sect. We may give even Charles Stuart credit so far, that he recognised the sincerity of the Quaker principle of non-resistance. James II. also became a patron of the Quakers and a personal friend of Barclay: it was to Barclay that James said: "The wind is fair for the Prince of Orange to come over." There is too much reason to fear that James's regard for his Quaker friend was assumed as a political blind; but I refrain from political as well as theological comments:

As I have mentioned Quaker non-resistance, I may as well give a story which I find in the life of Robert Barclay, written by David Barclay of Walthamstow in 1802. It is to the effect that Robert Barclay, his wife and her brother, and a Dutch friend named Aarent Sonmans, were travelling to London from a place in Hertfordshire, when they were bidden by a highwayman to stand and deliver. The biographer tells us that:

When the robber presented his pistol, Robert Barclay calmly asked him "how he came to be so rude," and took him by the arm; on which the robber let the pistol drop, and offered him no further violence, but his brother-in-law was rifled, and Sonmans received a mortal wound in the thigh, though it was thought rather accidentally than by design.

There might be a good deal to say about this incident, if we were discussing the Quaker doctrine of non-resistance, or even if we were dealing with Barclay's personal courage. But this Causerie is not concerned with either of those topics.

The Apology is only one of this remarkable writer's numerous works; his short life was for the most part passed in theological controversy. The biography I have already quoted does not give the date of his birth, but does state that he died on October 3, 1690, in the forty-second year of his age. I suppose one would have to ransack libraries to find copies of his minor writings; I know not whether the Apology itself was ever reprinted after the eighteenth century. I have in my possession a copy,

Printed and sold by T. Sowle Raylton and Luke Hinde, at the Bible in George Yard Lombard Street 1736, and a later one by Baskerville, Birmingham, 1765. The Life which I have quoted is said to be printed and sold by W. Phillips at George Yard Lombard Street in 1802.

It may be that these are scanty authorities for the opinion I have expressed, that Robert Barclay was a great master of English. Possibly, if I quoted from the body of the Apology, I could strengthen my position, but I could not expect the ACADEMY to inflict upon its readers quotations from a work of controversial divinity.

FICTION

Face to Face and Dolorosa. By FRANCISCO ACEBAL. Presented in English by MARTIN HUME. (Constable, 6s.)

WE were exceedingly interested to make the acquaintance of a young modern Spanish novelist, Don Francisco Acebal, whom Major Martin Hume, an acknowledged authority on matters Spanish, introduces to English readers in the present volume. But after the commendation of the preface we cannot but confess disappointment in the two short novels which the book contains. "Mater Dolorosa" is the tragedy of an only son worshipped by his mother and by his father, who is a worker in iron. They lavish money on him and he becomes a handsome sculptor with a studio in a gay quarter of Madrid; naturally, he is out of sympathy with his parents through the advantages which they have rejoiced to give him. The early part of the story is good—the ironmongery and its old master, whose nature has become imbued with some of the qualities of the iron he is constantly handling; the mother's delight at the birth of her baby son, and her unwillingness to let him ever come in contact with anything to do with the ironmongery—even his father's hands; the waggoners who bring presents from customers in the country to the "young gentleman" they have never seen—the whole picture is drawn with convincing clearness. But when the boy becomes a man he seems to lose his identity, and the tragedy of his murder in consequence loses all its poignancy. A shadow merely has been stabbed. There is nothing inevitable and, therefore, nothing moving about his end. "Face to Face" is finely conceived and worked out with considerable delicacy. In it Acebal shows the gradual encroachments of a great ironfoundry over the estates of a Spanish marquis, and how the young ironfounder wins the Marquis's daughter and even the old Marquis himself—pride of race caught by the tentacles of labour and strength. Though there is cleverness and subtlety in Acebal's work, there is no greatness: and nothing to warrant Major Hume's mention of him in the same breath with such masters as Turgenev and Tolstoy. Both novels, however, were well worth translation, and the translation has been made into admirable English, idiomatic and precise.

Profit and Loss. By JOHN OXENHAM. (Methuen, 6s.)

BUOYANCY is the feature of Mr. Oxenham's work, and it is an excellent quality; but with it is mingled an extravagant optimism, which brings to his fiction the kind of unnatural sweetness that simpers from the pictures of Carlo Dolce, and becomes rapidly wearisome. "Profit and Loss" is no exception. It is packed with life and incident, and each of the many characters has a distinct personality, as far as can be discerned through the strong rose-coloured light that is thrown upon them. The story deals with Mrs. Barty and her family, Meg, Joan (the girls are angels), and George, who is the hero, a paragon, and, as is not unusual with paragons, more than a little priggish. His bent is literature, and at it he sets to work with a will and eventual success, after travelling with a lunatic through Europe; the idiot tries to stab him, runs away and is lost in a storm on the Swiss mountains. George is nursed by Mary Lindsay, the companion of an old lady who has also died, and they travel slowly back home to the Bloomsbury boarding-house which his mother keeps. A fillip is given to the plot by the arrival towards the end of the book, just when George and Mary are affianced, of Mr. Barty, the convict-father, who declares himself to be Mary's father also; she, however, is only his step-daughter by a bigamous marriage, and the incident only adds to the happiness of the finale, because the convict-father returns to Australia and leaves behind him a little fortune of one hundred cool thousands. But the story, improbable as it is, goes with a swing, and some of the characters, notably Joan and a Mrs. Baird and Joan's mother, have charm in spite of everything, and they will be welcomed with the same degree of affection that is lavished upon the Madonnas of Carlo Dolce.

Wilhelmina in London. By BARRY PAIN. (Long, 3s. 6d.)

THE vaporous, ringleted beauties of the early Victorian Era are hardly to be regretted; but in these days, when the equality of the sexes is the subject for ever on the lips of plain and spectacled enthusiasts, who care more for their intellectual bumps than for their figures, it is refreshing to know of at least one woman who, after a varied and not unsuccessful career, can face the truth boldly and admit that her good fortune is owing to her looks, and has come to her "more because of the outside of her head than of the inside." In fact, the pretty woman rushed in where her cleverer sisters feared to tread, and prospered. Coming to London with the fixed determination to live by her wits alone, she ignored the fact that those wits were backed by considerable beauty. But Wilhelmina is only human. She takes her revenge on her good looks by swathing herself in hideous blue linen, smearing her features with black machine oil, and devoting herself to the doctoring and driving of motor cars. Her sacrifice is rewarded by a signal triumph over a mere man, whom she discovers trying to drive an unwilling motor with but one teaspoonful of petrol in its tank. Though possessed of a kind heart, Wilhelmina has a keen sense of humour, and we pity the unfortunate man. The quaint maid-of-all-work, Minnie Saxe, "flat as a board, with a small bun of sand-coloured hair, a mouth like a steel vice, and an eye like a gimlet," who "engaged" Wilhelmina "as mistress" early in her career, is a delightful character. "Given the sex and the opportunities, she would have been Napoleon;" as it is, she contents herself with "doing for" Wilhelmina and managing a weak-kneed old father. Her struggles with this poor old reprobate, who suffers from an inordinate craving, not for drink but for sweets, are highly entertaining; so is the story of Wilhelmina, who comes to London intent on making a fortune, but determined not to adopt any of the usual professions open to her sex. Her attempts are many and ingenious, and we are genuinely sorry to reach the last chapter, in which she "acknowledges in white satin, Honiton lace and orange blossom, that she is a woman after all."

FINE ART

ARTHUR TOMSON

OF late years Fate has been cruel to our younger painters. Arthur Melville, Robert Brough, Charles Wellington Furse and Arthur Tomson—what might not these have accomplished had their span of life been longer? To the loss British painting sustained by the premature deaths of Furse and Melville we have been awakened by the exhibitions recently held at the Burlington Fine Arts Club and at the Institute, and now the Memorial Exhibition of Arthur Tomson's paintings at the Baillie Gallery (54 Baker Street) quickens our regret that this sincere and talented artist should have been cut off in mid-career, at the very moment when the powers he patiently developed were finding fuller and statelier expression.

Like many of his fellow members of the New English Art Club, Tomson was a critic as well as a painter, and for many years his articles on art in the Morning Leader were eagerly sought after. Unlike certain of the clubmen, Tomson was not a critic who occasionally painted, but a painter who occasionally criticised; and though his theory of art was as sound and stimulating as his practice, we must, for the fullest revelation of his personality, go to his paintings rather than to his newspaper articles or even his book on Millet and the Barbizon School (Bell, 1903). The remarkable insight into the aims of the French Romanticists shown in this volume led many readers but slightly acquainted with the author's paintings to class him among the numerous imitators of the Barbizon painters. No estimate of Tomson's art could be more erroneous. His landscapes are peculiarly free from foreign influence; they are essentially British, and have far more in common with those of Cecil Lawson, Constable and the Norwich masters than with any work by Millet, Rousseau or Diaz. His subjects were much the same as those of the Romanticists, for, as Mrs. Pennell observes in her preface to Mr. Baillie's catalogue:

Like them, he [Tomson] went to the country for inspiration; not the stately country of Claude with its castles and ruins and classic elegance; but the country at his very threshold—the country where men toil and labour.

Here, then, the external resemblance ends, and, since the painters of Barbizon have this much in common with our own Constable, we may justly contend that in this particular also Tomson maintained a national tradition. His landscapes are not topographical, being, as all landscapes should be, a rendering of a mood of nature rather than an inventory of the features of any particular place, and it was his aim to present this rendering not only with truth but with beauty, that is to say in harmonious colour and rhythmical pattern. On the importance of design he was never tired of laying stress in his writings. "For attitude," said Tomson, the painter "should go to Nature, for colouring he should consult the requirements of his subject, but in regulating the arrangement of either, he should consult first of all that which lies within himself." Possibly, if Tomson had gone direct to nature for his colour as well as his "attitude," his landscapes might seem to us more modern in feeling and less old-fashioned in style. For while we admire the arrangement and atmosphere in such great sweeps of country side as In the Down Country (16) and The Happy Valley (30) it cannot be denied that a certain conventionality of colour takes us back to Crome and Constable respectively rather than to nature herself. In what direction his landscape would have developed it is impossible to say, but there is every reason to suppose that it would have grown more and more personal, more and more original; for towards the latter end of his life his art was changing into a second manner. And the salient features of this second manner were a growing preoccupation with truth to nature's lighting—best exemplified in his last picture, The Coming Storm (9)—and an increasing devotion to the study of the sea. Pure seascapes he rarely attempted, but in his later landscapes glimpses of the sea, in the middle distance or on the horizon, recur like a sweet refrain. In such a painting as On the Cornish Coast (22), with a farm labourer and horses ploughing in the foreground while beyond them a great stretch of sea reaches out to the horizon, Tomson invents what is practically a new genre, a combination of landscape, or rustic, with marine painting. In this welding together of downs, sea and sky into one harmonious whole he expresses a typical aspect of English landscape which has seldom been attempted and never portrayed with greater skill or deeper feeling.

Though stricken down in the very act of creating this new genre, Tomson had already proved his complete mastery of another subject which he made singularly his own. This was the humble Tabby, for, as Mrs. Pennell tells us:

He loved cats. His house was always full of them. . . . He kept them with him at all hours. He was familiar with their every movement, every curve of their soft, graceful bodies, as they lay relaxed in slumber, as they bent over the saucer of milk, as they rolled and leaped in play, as they crouched, rigid and alert, waiting to spring upon their prey. And as he knew them, so he drew and painted them. He never degraded them into an excuse for tedious sentimentalism, or Academic anecdote.

When these little cat-paintings were first shown at the New English and International exhibitions they proved a revelation to painters and the public; for, while cat-lovers marvelled at their truth and at the painter's insight into feline character and habits, craftsmen were equally lost in admiration of the beautiful colour-harmonies and exquisite designs. The place of Arthur Tomson in English landscape art must be left for future historians to determine, but if to paint one thing supremely well—more truthfully and more beautifully than it has ever been painted before—is to achieve greatness, then Tomson has a place, however humble, among the masters, if only for his unrivalled paintings of our friend the cat.

MUSIC

EARS TO HEAR

CHARLES LAMB, in his famous essay beginning: "I have no ear," shows that he must have been a keen listener to music without the key to comprehend and enjoy it. Otherwise he could not have been so much annoyed by it. He must have possessed, as it were, one side, at least, of the musical temperament, and he must have applied himself pretty rigorously to unravel the mystery which was denied him. It seems to me that he had the qualities which the ordinary half-musical frequenter of concert rooms lacks, while he had not those which such people possess. He knew how to listen, but knew not the interpretation thereof. We who so constantly listen vaguely and badly are often content with the kind of enjoyment which costs least trouble.

An impression, strengthened lately by new scenes and fresh experiences, has long since formed itself in my mind, that we Londoners need a good deal of teaching, followed by something of a reformation, before we can be said to be good listeners to music. I say nothing of the overcrowding of many concerts into a small part of the year, or of the other unbeautiful conditions, which the exigencies of town life make almost necessary. Such things are, after all, extraneous attributes and do not affect the mental attitude of the individual hearer. But that attitude often seems a wrong one, and there is a disease which afflicts the educated listener, and of which we only become aware either when we have left off for the time being trying to listen, or when, in some special moment, we hear with new ears. Once, not long ago, I came late to a concert at Queen's Hall, where a programme of more or less student works was being given, and found the slow movement of a new symphony in progress. I did not know that it was a symphony or who its composer was, and although it was not very great music, to follow it to its close was a delight of an entirely new kind. We very rarely get the chance of hearing a work without knowing anything of what is coming, and I am not contending that we are dependent upon a condition of blissful ignorance for right hearing. But in that particular case my ignorance of the work and my desire to catch the thread of it made me exercise all my faculties in a way which usually I do not trouble to do, and increased my pleasure tenfold. As I say, that piece of music was not very great or very profound, but it taxed all my general knowledge to make up for the lack of special knowledge. It gave me a taste of what would be the pleasure to a perfectly trained listener, who heard some masterpiece, say a Brahms symphony, under similar conditions. Very few have ever had this experience, for at the first hearing of the world's greatest masterpieces few have had the genius of listening sufficiently developed on all sides to grasp their meaning.

But with works which we know, most of us need to exercise our faculties aided by our knowledge in much keener fashion than we usually do, and, if we did, we should gain a much stronger, clearer impression from each hearing, so long as the work is really worth hearing again. We generally know at once too much and too little, enough to blunt our natural faculties rather by making us lazy, not enough to assist in following the main thread. The small contrivances to save an audience trouble, the little snips of information and musical quotations printed in programmes or distributed by concert agents to newspaper critics are a nuisance and a hindrance to the listener. If you know the work, they are less than your knowledge: if you are ignorant of it, they flatter you with a certain sense of knowledge for which you have not worked. Of course, a thoughtful analysis of a work, read before going to hear it, may be a real help, but even this ought to be kept out of the concert room. Miniature scores are another source of evil. Delightful and useful as they are to the student at home, yet it is dreadful to see people at a concert, their faces buried in the score, chasing the themes from strings to woodwind, imagining that they are improving their knowledge, while the music goes by them almost unheard.

No, the perfect listener will of course bring with him the perfect knowledge which includes these things, but the problem, as I conceive it, is to know well and to listen well at the same time. Curiously enough, it seemed to me at the recent Handel festival that within its limitations the audience there had found out how to do this. The devotees of Handel at the Crystal Palace really know their Judas Maccabæus well, and yet listen to it with an eagerness which makes one think what magnificent musical audiences we might boast, if the same qualities could be brought to bear on more exacting types of music. Their knowledge has for the most part been gained by the solid method of singing the choruses in provincial choral societies, by singing and playing the solos at home as well as by listening. Perhaps Handel's artificial position as the fetish of English music does something to get him a good audience, even in these advanced days, by helping to create the desire to listen; but it is far more the real knowledge combined with the real enthusiasm, which his finest moments can still excite, that does this. Moreover, it is for the most part knowledge of the right sort; it is knowing the music as music, having a complete impression of the whole, rather than analytical knowledge, which most helps the listener. Academic knowledge is often as much a snare to the listener as to the composer, because it needs a great mind to subordinate it to its proper place.

Once we are armed with adequate knowledge, the next thing is to keep to the point in listening, not to be led away by momentary sound-effects, either good or bad, things which become more conspicuous as our knowledge increases. Most of us have been annoyed by the criticism of the cultivated person, who refuses to admit that he enjoyed a fine performance because of small blemishes; just as we all have felt outraged by the applause following a last high note, where the whole performance was bad. These are instances of the educated and the ignorant alike losing the point, led away by a cross trail. Concentration is, of course, the moral of it all. You cannot concentrate attention while programmes, scores, or your own stock of knowledge claim each a separate part of it. When the knowledge becomes assimilated, it contributes to the end and helps to give the hearer ears to hear.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

A FEW more extracts from Mr. Murray's autumn list may be of interest to our readers. It is announced, and we hope finally, that "The Letters of Queen Victoria, 1837-1861" on which Mr. Arthur C. Benson and Lord Esher have been hard at work for some time, will appear before Christmas. There are to be three illustrated volumes. "The Young People," by An Older Companion, is a book of light essays on "the manifold happiness of the London life of certain young people well known to the writer," forming a manual for every one who loves London and children, written especially for the children. "Adrift in New Zealand," by E. Way Elkington, gives the experiences of a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society who arrived in New Zealand with only threepence and spent seven years in the country with varied occupation and fortune. He devotes some space to the Maoris, with whom at one time he dwelt. "Colonization and Empire" by F. A. Kirkpatrick, and "Empire Builders" by W. K. Stride, are lectures that may be given with a magic lantern, describing the growth of the Colonies and the great men, from King Alfred to James Cook, who have worked for the Empire. Among natural history books we observe Mr. Tickner Edwardes's "An Idler in the Wilds," a book illustrated by the author, who deals, as in his delightful former books, with wild nature and country life. "Queen and Cardinal," by Mrs. Colquhoun Grant, is a sketch of the life and companions of Anne of Austria, the famous Regent of France and mother of Louis XIV.; and another historical work, of a different order, is Mr. Horatio F. Brown's translation from the Italian of Pompeo Molmenti's "History of Venice." There will be three volumes of this, in two parts each; dealing respectively with Venice in the Middle Ages, in the Golden Age, and in her decadence. The new Indian Texts Series is to start with Niccolao Manucci's "Storia Do Mogor," or Mogul Memoirs (1643-1708), translated and edited with notes and introduction (under the supervision of the Royal Asiatic Society) by Mr. William Irvine. Craftswomen will be interested in Mrs. Mincoff's "Pillow Lace," an illustrated manual for workers and collectors.

Mr. W. A. Horn, who, some twelve years ago, fitted out the "Horn Scientific Expedition to Central Australia," has written a book of travel reminiscences which he calls "Notes by a Nomad: An Olla-Podrida." This work will be illustrated from photographs taken by the author and will shortly be published by Messrs. Melville and Mullen of Melbourne and London.

Mr. David Nutt announces the publication, early in the autumn, of a new novel by Mr. Arnold Bennett, entitled "Whom God Hath Joined—" It is a study of the problems of marriage and divorce in modern society. The action opens in the district of the Five Towns and the later scenes take place in the Law Courts.

Mrs. Meynell has made a selection from the poems of Father John B. Tabb, of St. Charles College, Maryland, which will be published by Messrs. Burns and Oates.

Messrs. Methuen announce a little guide to Normandy by Mr. Cyril Scudamore, with forty illustrations and a railway map; and a book by Mr. S. Baring-Gould on the history, legends and beauties of the Rhine, with illustrations in colour by Mr. Trevor Haddon and a series of reproductions from photographs.

Professor Garvie has been writing a survey of the recent literature on Christian ethics which will appear in the forthcoming number of the "Review of Theology and Philosophy."

Messrs. Jack announce for the autumn publishing season a number of the most famous poems of all time, printed in bold type and specially illustrated by a series of pictures by well-known artists of to-day. The booklets will be sold at the same price as the various series at present on the market which have either no illustrations or merely black and white reproductions. The artists' work in this series will be rendered in the full colours of the originals.

Mr. Alston Rivers announces for immediate publication a novel of Devonshire, called "A Pixy in Petticoats," by a new author.

Messrs. Cassell are about to issue monthly a sixpenny edition of standard novels, the first of which, "The Hundred Days," by Max Pemberton, will appear on Wednesday next. It is the aim of Messrs. Cassell to give a six-shilling novel for sixpence, and each publication of their monthly issue of the sixpenny edition will be cheap only in price.

The "Jewish Literary Annual" to be published in October will contain many new features. The volume will include the Presidential Address delivered last October by Sir Philip Magnus, M.P., before the Union of Jewish Literary Societies, whose organ the Annual is; a symposium on Jewish religious education in England, and a series of essays dealing with the progress of Jewish literature in the different European countries during the year. This section will contain articles on Yiddish literature and on Hebrew literature and that of the Holy Land. The volume, edited by Mr. Albert M. Hyamson, will conclude with a résumé of the activities of the Union and its forty constituent societies during the past year.

The next volume in the Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry will be Mary Wollstonecraft's "Original Stories" for children, with five illustrations by William Blake. Mr. E. V. Lucas, in an introduction, suggests that the work is chiefly interesting for two reasons apart from its original purpose—for the light it throws on the attitude of the nursery authors of its day towards children, and for the character of Mrs. Mason, "the first and strongest British Matron," who "came before Mrs. Proudie, and also, it is interesting to note, before Sir Willoughby Patterne." The book will be ready next week.

A new writer, Mr. Gordon Holmes, is publishing his first novel with Mr. Werner Laurie next week. It is called "The Arncliffe Puzzle," and is a story of to-day. The author has woven a love interest into a mystery.

Mr. J. Cuthbert Hadden, author of several monographs on the Master Musicians, of "George Thomson, the Friend and Correspondent of Burns," and other works, has been making a study of the '45 period. The book, which Messrs. Methuen will issue, is to be entitled "Prince Charlie," and is neither a biography of the Young Pretender nor an historical romance. It will include a consideration of the social life of Scotland towards the middle of the eighteenth century.

M. Jusserand, the French Ambassador at Washington, has completed the second volume of his "History of English Literature," and Mr. Fisher Unwin will issue the book during the coming autumn season. It is close upon a quarter of a century since he published "Les Anglais au moyen âge"; in the years 1837-90 M. Jusserand was Councillor at the French Embassy in London, and during this period he made researches for his Literary History, the first section of which was published in 1894.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ANCIENTS AND THE FUTURE LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your review of Vers La Joie there are, permit me to say, a few far too positive assertions. For instance, it were no hard task to show that lessons of "obedience, humility, patience and renunciation" were part of the "Pagan equipment" as well as of the Christian "equipment." So far are they from being "essentially modern," that one has but to recall Marcus Aurelius, or Epictetus, to remember that these so-called peculiar Christian qualities are the essential ones of all they wrote.

As far as the love of life, and the fear of death go, is the modern world really better off than the ancient? Personally I deem that we are worse off, inasmuch as we fail, most of us, to get that enjoyment out of existence which the ancients did. We have not an equal zest for it. Is this not by itself enough to account for the melancholy of some of its poetry, now and then? What is prized is hard to part with. Who that is happy wishes to die?

But too much may be made of this melancholy note by presenting but one side of the shield. Many, perhaps quite as many, a passage could be quoted of a joyous nature, from ancient classical writers as can be, and, by pessimistic critics, are, of a dolorous sort.

Just for the fun of the thing, as it were, your reviewer sent me to the French edition of Jacobs's Anthology (Hachette & Co., 2 vols., 1863), and I have to thank him for the treat he has been the means of affording me. It includes, as you know, many Christian, as well as Pagan epitaphs, and I found in the former the same admixture of gloom and hope as in the latter.

As instances of Pagan hope, let the following be quoted:

"O, eagle placed a-top of this tomb, why gazest thou so steadfastly towards heaven?—I am the emblem of Plato's soul, which has fled upwards to Olympus. His body, born of the ground, he has left behind in Attic earth."

"Tell me, O dog, to whom does the monument, over which you keep guard, belong?—To the dog.—What was his name whom you call the dog?—Diogenes.—Tell me his Country.—He was a man of Sinope.—What, he who lived in a tub?—Precisely, but, now he is dead, his home is amid the stars."

"Small is this tomb; but, see, rising from it the glory of the man of genius it encloses, the glory of Thales."

Many more of the same tenour could be given, but I fear to trespass too far on your space. "The Celestial regions." "May their kindred souls have the same eternal home." "The gentle Pluto." "Both, now, with other pious souls, dwell in the Elysian fields." "Have courage and confidence for what is left to you of life; death will bring us together again soon." "I am now in the palace of the immortal gods. Here, in my Celestial home, it is a perpetual dawn. Mercury led me in by the hand, and procured for me the great glory of living among the blessed in the starry heavens, and of sitting on seats of gold along with old friends." "Rejoice, too, O passer by: may you have many joys to taste yet on earth. We, who are dead, have no lack of our own."

Now, per contra, take some of the Christian ones. Select a few from the two hundred and sixty-four of Saint Gregory's epigrams.

"Oh, cruel grave which has opened itself to receive that glorious youth, Césaire. How unjust to take him and leave his parents alive. But let the grave be acquitted; it could not permit a young man to live who was wiser than his elders."

"Thou hast left behind thee, Césaire, all thy brethren, and hast now, in their place, only a narrow grave."

"Césaire, who, with his sublime intelligence, had embraced all the learning of the world, is now, alas! but a little heap of dust."

"I, Martinian, laden once with all earthly honours, am now but dust and ashes. Water my tomb with your tears, but touch it not."

"Alas! alas! Amphilogus has been snatched from a wise and virtuous wife and is now alone in the melancholy grave."

"Euphemius, at the tender age of twenty, shining both in learning and beauty, has gone down to his grave. Alas! Alas! Death comes too quickly for the virtuous and good."

"Descended to the gloomy regions," is the expression of another of them; and almost all of them are similar in tone. In none is the spirit of Paul's grand exclamation to be traced:

Oh, grave where is thy victory?
Oh, Death where is thy sting?

Apologising for the length of this communication, which I hope may be excused for what you may perhaps deem its interest,

MR. BENSON'S PATER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With reference to Mr. Robert Ross's review of Mr. A. C. Benson's life of Walter Pater which appeared in your issue of the 21st inst., I fail to see why the fact of my having recalled Pater's intention of treating the history of Raymond of Toulouse should be described as an anecdote or as an attempt to "conceal something."

So far as I knew Pater there was nothing to conceal but much to admire and I hold that the literary projects of a great writer have an interest for students of his achieved work.

To know that Walter Pater considered his "Plato and Platonism" the work most likely to resist the test of time seems to me quite as interesting as that he once said to Oscar Wilde: "You have a phrase for everything."

DOUGLAS AINSLIE.

July 24.

[Mr. Robert Ross writes: As rival Grevilles Mr. Ainslie and myself have failed to impress each other. I have obviously not appreciated the significance of his recollections, any more than he has realised the significance of my criticism. But I have one great advantage over him, in that I am able to admire sincerely and praise unreservedly Mr. Ainslie the poet and trenchant dramatic critic of Truth.

Walter Pater was, if all his friends are to be believed, a very reserved man, and his friends in a very proper spirit, which I regret to have met with so seldom, have been equally reserved. If, however, they have nothing more to tell us than what they have confided to Mr. Benson, I begin to doubt the amount of intimacy to which Pater admitted them or to suspect that they are exercising their discretion unnecessarily in public.]

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Robert Ross is so charming a writer that I cannot but regret the tone of part of his article on Mr. Benson's "Pater" in the ACADEMY for July 21. Particularly distasteful are the concluding paragraphs, which seem to me to have but one meaning, and should never have been written.

Whatever Pater's opinions might be, we are only concerned with those he has explicitly stated. If a reviewer has the right to rip up his subject like a pig (in Tennyson's vivid phrase) he has certainly no right, if his anatomical researches yield no result, to avenge himself by reading as chroniques scandaleuses words which were not written autobiographically, but with a specified object.

It is indeed a pitiable sight to view the impotent scraping of these men with muck-rakes, amongst the "remains" of this or that man of genius. Very certainly in the case of Pater, their research will be vain. The man lived his own quiet life, and gave the public the flower of it, as his works testify. For the rest, has not Mr. George Moore told us of his "deliberate platitude," of his careful deference to public opinion, of his friendliness that never could become intimacy? Mr. Moore's article (in Pall Mall Magazine, July 1904) is indeed a more illuminating study of the man than all Mr. Benson's book.

With the various criticisms, either of Mr. Benson or Mr. Ross, I have no time to deal fully. I would, however, urge critics to show some little amount of common sense in the exercise of their vocation. Thus, Mr. Benson blames Pater for faults that would have been faults indeed had "Marius" been intended as a book of Christian Apologetics: but, then, you see it was not meant to be: Mr. Ross seems to think that it should answer the canons of any novel and actually compares it to that wretched morass of middle-class sentiment "John Inglesant"—that book beloved by people who read Mrs. Humphry Ward and talk about culture.

Fie Mr. Ross! "Marius" is a book alone, and not to be classed with any novel, philosophic or otherwise. Then, "Gaston" we are told, is a failure. Well, much depends on the meaning of failure. The book was never even finished, and the sixth chapter was published after Pater's death, without any of that careful revision that all his work underwent. Failure or no, however, it contains two of its author's finest "Imaginary Portraits" (Ronsard and Montaigne) and many passages worthy to be classed with the best of his work.

Much of Mr. Benson's book is indeed admirably sympathetic and illuminating; but in certain places he seems to find fault for the sake of fault-finding; that so common frailty of the critic, who would seem afraid else that his capability will be questioned. The same words, almost, might be applied to the article of your own contributor. With much of it one cordially agrees whilst deploring its flippancy in certain places. Some at least still regard Pater as "the greatest prose writer of our time," and not only this but as one, who, in a time of change in opinion, not only religious but ethical, could still teach a great lesson, and himself study to be quiet and show the way. Perhaps the best motto for his own works would be that passage from "Hippolytus Veiled": "Books for the delighted reading of a scholar, willing to ponder at leisure, to make his way surely, and understand."

DOES THE WORD "SARACEN" MEAN "ORIENTAL"?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Impossible etymologies die hard. If there is one etymology on which modern etymologists are apparently agreed, it is the derivation of the word "Saracen." In the dictionaries of Webster, Annandale, Isaac Taylor, Skeat, and in many other etymological dictionaries we find it taken for granted that the word "Saracen" is of Arabic origin—namely from sharq "sunrise," and that it means "Oriental." And yet, strange to say, in spite of this general consent among etymologists, it may be affirmed without fear of contradiction that there is no evidence, no probability even of an Arabic derivation. One modern scholar, Hansleigh Wedgwood, in his Dictionary made a protest against the sharq explanation, but it has not been listened to. He says very pertinently that the Arabian tribes would not have appeared to themselves in the character of Easterns, that the name of Saracens, or any tribal or national name derived from an Arabic sharq, is unknown to the Arabs themselves, and that the word "Saraceni" was in use by Greek and Latin writers, who would never have devised an Arabic appellation for Arab tribes—a term quite strange to the desert tribes and perfectly unmeaning to the western peoples.

Long before Wedgwood we find Gibbon protesting against the most popular of the etymologies of "Saracen," namely the one from an Arabic word signifying "Oriental situation." Gibbon says that this "is refuted by Ptolemy, who expressly remarks the western and southern position of the Saracens, then an obscure tribe on the borders of Egypt; the appellation cannot therefore allude to any national character, and since it was imposed by strangers [on the Arabian tribes], it must be found, not in the Arabic, but in a foreign language."

If we accept this reasoning, and if the "Saraceni" of Greek and Latin writers must be derived from some foreign—probably some non-Semitic—language, the etymology of the word will probably for ever remain an unsolved problem.

A. L. MAYHEW.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—It is pleasing to note that Mr. Mayhew's article recommended and has provoked suggestions for practical steps towards a Simplification of our Spelling. I presume we may infer that Professor Skeat has smasht the case for etymological spelling; that this bogie—which has frightened so many—is now laid, never to be raised again.

I was delighted to observe Mr. Mayhew's closing injunctions to all spelling reformers, particularly those of such standing as Professor Skeat and Dr. Sweet, to give Reformed Spelling a practical lift, by adopting simplified forms in their own publications. In noticing Professor Skeat's booklet for the "Journal of Orthography," published by Dr. Larison, of Ringos, N.J., I used similar arguments, and almost identical language. The coincidence is somewhat singular. Professor Brander Matthews follows his own advice.

Pronunciation, like spelling varies, the latter being the greatest sinner; but if "A Student of Literature" helps to establish a broad, workable alphabet, reducing the multiplicity of vowels and diphthongs, bringing them into the "one sound one sign" plane, then pronunciation will have a fair chance of being read and understood of all men, which the British Weekly plainly indicates is far from being so, saying "misled" is pronounced "mizzeld!" I presume he knows "shammfast" was current as Old English, and I believe adopted by Milton.

Is it possible to get your readers to adopt Professor Skeat's suggested simplified forms, viz.: hav. giv; grev, feild; shipt, mixt; aproov, freez; assemb, lill; brekfast, medow; cumfort, muney; curage, ruf, tuch; labor, honor; decalog; del, lam; eg, stif, bath, etc.

July 21.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the ACADEMY for July 14 I see an article on Spelling Reform by Mr. A. L. Mayhew. The sight of the heading "Spelling Reform" carried me back thirty years, when I took part in a discussion with Alexander John Ellis in the columns of the ACADEMY of that date, and my interest in the question has continued ever since.

Mr. Carnegie, as you are aware, has formed and financed a "Simplified Spelling Board" for propaganda. Professor Skeat of Cambridge has a pamphlet on the subject upon which the writer of the article in the ACADEMY offers some remarks.

I think if Mr. Mayhew was aware of the present position of the question in America especially and in England, some of his remarks would be somewhat modified.

Professor Skeat is severe upon the neglect or hostility (call it boycotting) to the subject of Spelling Reform by Reviews, Newspapers, etc.

The charge of neglect or hostility to the subject, cannot be levelled against the ACADEMY, which was the first of high class Reviews to open its columns at that date of strong prejudice, and now upon the resurrection of the question to public notice, in a fair and considerate spirit, the ACADEMY admits a discussion of the question in its influential columns.

Considering the nebulous and sporadic condition at present of the movement, with so many competitive schemes abroad, each author fighting for his own plan, it was hardly to be expected that "Men of Letters, business men, the man in the street," would come forward in support of any particular scheme. Even Professor Skeat's plan is rather shadowy for practical ends.

And now for the conclusion of the whole matter, what is to be done, what is the motive-power behind, the raison d'être of the movement?

We are now in the throes of a stupendous effort for the establishment of a National System of Primary Education. The first and among the most important objects of all Education is to enable everybody to Read and Write their Mother Tongue. The great stumbling-block to this end is the chaotic state of the English Alphabet.

Simplified Spelling is the complement to the Education Bill. A Departmental Committee of Inquiry would examine all proposals and would recommend some plan for practical adoption in Schools.

The omission of surplus, silent and useless letters would be a good step forward, as faintly hinted at by Dr. Skeat. Lists of such "idle" letters have been drawn up in America and in England.

EDWARD JONES, B.A.

"CONCEALED POETS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In my communication under this heading, the sentence "this letter is addressed to a poet who confesses to be a 'concealed poet,'" should read "this letter is addressed to a poet by one who confesses that he is a 'concealed poet.'" The omission of the two words was due to my own fault, not yours.

It has been suggested to me that a more likely Shakespearean sonnet than those I instanced may be the original of the Twickenham sonnet written by Bacon. It is Sonnet 25, which pointedly alludes to a fallen favourite who till then could

Of public honour and proud titles boast.

This sonnet is worth comparison with Bacon's speech at the trial of Essex, when he said—"For you, my lord, should know that though princes give their subjects cause of discontent, though they take away the honours they have heaped upon them, though they bring them to a lower estate than they raised them from, yet ought they not to forget their allegiance."

Till June 1598 Essex had been a royal favourite, "famoused for fight," according to the Sonnet; but then came he under a "frown" that made that "glory die"; while Bacon, holding no office, could not be "removed." He was safe in this respect.

A study of the Sonnets and the "Apology for Essex" will prove to any impartial mind that many of the expressions and similes used in both fit marvellously well into the relative positions of Bacon and Essex.

We have the line, for instance—

To witness duty, not to show my wit,

the stand assumed by Bacon in the trial of Essex.

Then take Sonnet 29—can its pathetic wail come from Shakespeare, Bacon, or Essex (per Bacon)? It begins:

When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state.

At what period of his career did the position of Shakespeare, the actor, ever assume this description or confession? Every line of this Sonnet can be read into the lives of Bacon and Essex. For years after his father's death, Bacon was "in disgrace with fortune" (he had no means—he was "working for bread") and "men's eyes," his uncle's in particular, were not directed to him (he was unappreciated). Essex had also the latter experience in 1601. What about Shakespeare? His life was one of uninterrupted success from the day he abandoned horse-holding for stage-playing and play-writing, when had he occasion to "beweep his outcast state?" The word is "beweep," not "bewept"; and the date of the Sonnets, according to "our greatest authority on Shakespeare," ranges from 1593 to 1603, the latter year being evidently referred to in the "eclipse" sonnet, No. 107, over Queen Elizabeth's death. When Shakespeare was supposed to have penned his first sonnet (1593), he had produced Love's Labour's Lost, the three parts of Henry VI., The Contention, and The True Tragedy. He had previously abandoned his wife, poaching, Stratford, and the holding of horses at the stage door. He was a successful man of business in 1593: so what cause had he for "beweeping" in 1593, when Sonnet 29 was probably written, is a question I ask Mr. Sidney Lee and Professor Dowden. He might have "bewept," he could scarcely "beweep" at the date referred to.

Other two points, and I have finished. In Sonnet 111 we read:

Thence comes it that my name receives a brand,
And almost thence my nature is subdued
To what it works in, like the dyer's hand.

How came it that in 1593 a man who had been obliged to flee Stratford for poaching had to confess that play-writing was infra dig.—that he was ashamed of the profession, and added:

Pity me, then, and wish I were renew'd?

Play-writing—successful play-writing—might have been a disreputable occupation for money-making to an aristocrat like Bacon, but how could it possibly be described as such in the case of a plebeian like Shakespeare? And yet in the plays the writer shows himself an aristocrat, not a plebeian.

Besides, it is a matter of fact that Shakespeare never authorised the publication of the Sonnets (1609)—they were stolen, we are informed by Mr. Lee, by Thorpe. What was wrong with them if they were

Shakespeare's work? In 1599 the first edition of "The Passionate Pilgrim" was issued by Jaggard—the bulk of the volume being written by Barnfield and others. Shakespeare did not object to the attributed authorship. A third edition appeared in 1612, under "W. Shakespeare's name," with verses filched from Heywood. Heywood objected, and "Shakespeare's name was removed from the title-page of a few copies" (Lee, p. 183). The Sonnets were published without Shakespeare's authority. Why? Possibly because he thought Bacon—if he were the author—might have adopted Heywood's principle and remonstrated. At any rate, Shakespeare never objected to the unauthorised issue of the Sonnets, and he never acknowledged them as his own work, yet we find them appearing in every edition of the works, along with "The Passionate Pilgrim," which everybody knows he did not write. These Sonnets still puzzle more than the proverbial Quaker, and among the more,

THE LAST WORDS OF GREAT MEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Few phrases arrest the attention of mankind more than those uttered by the dying lips of great men, they become as much imbedded in the history of their country as the fly in amber. Such phrases by constant spoken and written reiteration are among the unforgettable things of life. For these phrases voice often so admirably "what all have thought but ne'er so well expressed." Are we not familiar in our own day with pithy utterances in the political arena which have been so apt and striking that they have reverberated round the world? Yet despite this, and undeniably true as my statement is, how many of the phrases attributed to great men of the past were actually uttered by them? This pertinent question is brought forcibly home by your allusions, Mr. Editor, in your issue of the 14th inst. to a letter recently published in Germany anent Goethe's last words—"Light, more light!" Few dying words have been more quoted, and yet if that letter is to be accepted, the phrase was never uttered by that great man. Fact is indeed a great destroyer of our illusions. Hardly less famous than "Light, more light!" is the phrase attributed to the younger Pitt when dying—"O my country! how I leave my country!" Yet how true is it that but a step divides the sublime from the ridiculous, for it has been alleged that his last words really were—"I think I could eat one of Bellamy's mutton pies."

Indeed I think it might be safely affirmed that the whole subject teems with errors which can be divided under the following heads:

(1) Phrases never uttered.

(2) Wrong attribution, viz., phrases fathered on persons who never uttered them.

In dealing with this subject we have to recognise that men dearly love a phrase that epitomises their thoughts, convictions, or party bias, hence it follows that the surest way to political popularity is to coin phrases which shall be adopted as representing their principles. Disraeli regarded the phrase and used it as one of the most effective political weapons.

I have but touched the fringe of this very interesting subject and must leave it to your readers to amplify or deny my conclusions.

STANLEY HUTTON.

THE READING-HABIT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The "reading-habit"! What a vile phrase! (I apologise to its author, of whose identity I am perfectly ignorant.) But seriously, what kind of glory and honour is to be meted out to those who have fostered the habit of reading for reading's sake? Surely it is nothing more or less than an insidious form of paralysis of the mind—a disease, I agree, public libraries have helped to spread most disastrously.

A public of sterile mind, having neither an appetite for learning, nor a love of literature, whose dull fancies must be tickled by sensationalism, appears to me to form the majority of public library frequenters. They are in and out of the public library, in much the same manner as the confirmed drunkard is in and out of every public-house. And the analogy holds good further; for it takes as strong a dose of sensationalism to ruffle the surface of the one's imagination, as it does of alcohol to intoxicate the other.

That public libraries have benefited thousands let no one deny; but for Heaven's sake, let their custodians try to forget they "have formed the reading-habit in many millions of people."

[Has M. P. reflected that the reading-habit may be an antidote to, or preventive of, the drink-habit? It may not benefit the sufferer, but at least it does no harm to his family.—ED.]

THE FAMOUS THIN PAPER CLASSICS are steadily covering the whole available ground of English literature. In spite of the numerous reprints now on the market they maintain their unique character for perfection, for purity of text, soundness and artistic charm of production, and cheapness.
Some of these dainty and portable volumes, which cost 3s. 6d. each, bound in leather, contain within a small compass five or six times as much matter as the leather-bound volumes in other series which are sold at 2s. The type is very legible, the paper opaque, the binding durable, and the decorative details exceedingly artistic. The volumes are really uniform typographically as well as in outward appearance. The various colours of the bindings serve only to mark the different classes into which the series is divided. New volumes are constantly being added, not so fast but that the reader of moderate means may find himself able to acquire the whole series. All of these works are printed from new type and never from old plates.

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

Printed in large, clear type on extremely thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, from drawings by Edmund J. Sullivan, Alfred Garth Jones, & Herbert Cole

"Lo, Messrs. NEWNES have published at the price
Of three-and-six apiece these volumes three (Their print is pleasant and their binding nice)
Of BYRON'S varied mass of poetry.
Thin-paper classics are they, but to me
What most appeals is this:—that they are bound
In lambskin, like the wolf who fain would be Mistaken for a sheep, and scheming found
Sheep's clothing best to help him as he prowled around."

THE PAPER FOR A FRIEND ABROAD.

Writing from Saranac Lake, New York, U.S.A., a reader says :

"I have just finished your issue of June 30th, and I want to say 'Thanks' for it. My father sends it me each week, and I thought it would pleasure you to know how much it is appreciated, though it makes me very homesick at times.

"This is a health resort full of lungers from all parts, and the 'Saturday Westminster' goes quite a round as soon as I get through with it. The Americans—quite a good class up here—are amazed at the price considering the quality, and at the merit of the whole production."

The subscription rate for abroad is 8s. 8d. a year, post free.
Shorter periods at proportionate rates.

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

THE LITERARY WEEK

ON the walls of the National Gallery there is no more haunting portrait than that of Mary Wollstonecraft, and it seems almost a paradox that she should be the authoress of a little book for children which has long been a treasure of the bibliophile and is now reprinted. Its full title is "Original Stories from Real Life; with Conversations, calculated to Regulate the Affections, and Form the Mind to Truth and Goodness." It was not Mary Wollstonecraft's writing that made the book precious, but Blake's characteristic illustrations. From the very titles of these one can gain an idea of the character of the volume. "Look what a fine morning it is. Insects, Birds and Animals are all enjoying existence." There can be no mistake about the enjoyment of existence of the three figures which Blake has drawn. "Indeed we are very happy!" is put below a picture of a smoking hearth, a wife with the baby in her arms, an amiable looking husband with other arrows in his quiver and a boy's model of a ship on the mantelpiece. "Be calm, my child, remember that you must do all the good you can the present day" is illustrated by a lady with the tall bonnet of the late eighteenth century and two girls in flowing robes. "Trying to trace the sound, I discovered a little hut, rudely built," is the text for a picture of the dwelling of the Welsh Harper. "Economy and Self-denial are necessary, in every station, to enable us to be generous" is placed below a family in distress on which the righteous Mrs. Mason and her two pupils are gazing with the countenances of archangels:

The text, though vastly different from that which is provided for the juvenile population of to-day, can scarcely be described as namby-pamby. It contains among other things, a tale of suicide that would not have discredited any of those gloomy novelists who in this twentieth century harrow the feelings of their readers:

The dead man's image haunted his imagination—he started—imagined that he was at his elbow—and shook the hand that had received the dying grasp—yet still it was pressed, and the pressure entered into his very soul. On the table lay two pistols, he caught up one, and shot himself. The report alarmed the family—the servants and his daughter, for his brother was not at home, broke open the door—and she saw the dreadful sight! As there was still some appearance of life, a trembling ray—she supported the body, and sent for assistance. But he soon died in her arms without speaking, before the servant returned with a surgeon.

Rarely do we find in a grave and serious book a challenge such as that which Mr. G. G. Coulton has made in "From St. Francis to Dante." His point is that people who hold up the Middle Ages as having been superior to our own, are under a grave error. Therefore he lays down his glove to those writers who "disparage modern civilisation in comparison with what seems to me a purely imaginary past." His offer is as follows:

If any one of these will now take me at my word, I will willingly accept his severest criticisms to the extent of thirty-two octavo pages, restrict my reply within the same limit, and publish the whole at my own expense without further comment. If my contentions are false, I am thus undertaking to offer every facility for my own exposure.

To take one example, there seem to have been many more fleas in the Middle Ages than there are to-day. Mr. Coulton cites a passage from Cæsarius where he describes the conversion of a knight who had long wished to enter the cloister, but who always hung back, "on the cowardly plea that he feared the vermin of the garments (for our woollen clothing harbours much vermin)." He gives rather a clever translation of "those verses which men are wont to repeat" quoted by Salimbene. The verses are:

In x finita tria sunt animalia dira:
Sunt pulices fortes, cimices culicumque cohortes;
Sed pulices saltu fugiunt, culicesque volatu,
Et cimices pravi nequeunt foetore necari.

And this is Mr. Coulton's translation:

Three are the torments that rhyme—ex,
Pulex and culex and cimex.
Mighty to leap is the pulex,
Swift on the wing is the culex;
But the cimex, whom no fumigation can slay,
Is a monster more terrible even than they.

In Mrs. Humphry Ward's pleasant memoir of her brother, a notice of which will be found on another column, she gives some interesting details in regard to Mr. Thomas Arnold's attitude to her literary work. We are told that he was the first to prophesy the success of "Robert Elsmere." In Mrs. Humphry Ward's books he seems to have taken a keen and critical interest. "Eleanor" does not seem to have been much to his mind, but to the delight of the novelist he found a "great help and distraction, during a dark time, in 'Lady Rose's Daughter.'" He wrote: "The Beschreibung in it is reduced to the minimum, and the Handlung brought to a maximum, as the great Vischer says they ought to be." Mrs. Humphry Ward goes on to say:

He liked a story to be "ripiely human, and tasting of life." Mrs. Oliphant delighted him; at her best he put her very high, and there was scarcely a story of hers that he could not read or hear with pleasure. How many hours were charmed or lightened by her books!

In the Monthly Review for August will be found a singularly fine appreciation of the personality and poetry of the late Nora Chesson. The salient characteristic in her was "the love which beats like a human heart," and no extract could illustrate this better than the verse which concludes the review:

Here are some sunsets we have seen together,
Some silver-coloured dawns we've watched apart;
November's twilight, May's enchanted weather,
And the great sea known of no sailor's chart.
Rainbows and rain are here; and here are laughter
And sorrow of a glad and grieving year;
But joy you give me comes before and after
And is in every word I write you, dear.

Mr. W. H. Mallock, in the August number of the National Review, gives the Poet Laureate a sound rating for carelessness. Thus does he discourse of Mr. Alfred Austin's shortcomings:

This defect consists in the exaggerated importance which he attributes, firstly, to the spontaneous flow of poetic thought; and, secondly, to the language in which he himself spontaneously expresses it. In my judgment, both these primary spontaneities require to be submitted to a secondary process far longer and more painful than Mr. Austin will admit to be necessary; and were I asked by him to justify this judgment I should appeal from what I regard as his fatal failures to what I regard as his own signal successes.

In recompense he directs attention to the beautiful verse which on occasion Mr. Austin can produce. The following is as about a fine an example as could have been selected:

The fluttering of the fallen leaves
Dimples the leaden pool awhile;
So Age impassively receives
Youth's tale of troubles with a smile.

The late Lord Tennyson used to have an almost whimsical horror of seeing his poetry printed in school books. Probably he had a lively memory of the old days at Somersby when his stern parent, Dr. Tennyson, used to take instruction into his own hands. How many of us remember a time when we hated the very names of Virgil and Horace, even of Homer himself, because they were associated with an eternal grind? So strong is this memory in the mind of the present writer that it always keeps him from returning to Germany, where one of his ephemeral works has been turned into a school book and been published with notes, glossary, and other apparatus of the modern pedant. He cannot help imagining that the unfortunate schoolboys who have been compelled to devote hours of sunshine to the elucidation of this work will regard the writer as a kind of foreign ogre deserving of the worst punishment that schoolboys can inflict.

These reflections arose upon looking through a little volume issued by Messrs. Blackie and Sons under the name of "An Introduction to Good Poetry." It made us ask if the poetry we read at school was good or not. Whatever the answer may be, it was so drilled into the minds of the pupil that the writer can repeat a great deal of it by heart at the present moment. The popular school poems of that day were: "The boy stood on the burning deck," "Up, up let us a voyage take, why sit we here at ease," "What is time? I asked an aged man, a man of cares," "The clock strikes one, we take no note of time." This last, it may be necessary to inform our readers, is an ebullition from the gloomy muse of Dr. Young whose "Night Thoughts" was then considered a classic. Pollock's "Course of Time" and the works of Akenside, and, as one of our morning contemporaries charmingly puts it, at least once a week, "Men of that ilk" were supposed to be classics in those days.

We wonder if the excellent Mr. Davidson who edits the collection before us be not under a similar superstition. If the boys in elementary schools are able to read with any pleasure or understanding Tennyson's "Glory of warrior, glory of orator, glory of song," Mr. Kipling's "Recessional," Shelley's "Summer and Winter," or, worst of all, Wordsworth's "Lines composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey," all that we can say is that the new generation differs very much from the old. These and many other beautiful poems included in this volume would surely be Greek to the average schoolboy. Even on a point of quality surely Herrick's "Fair daffodils, we weep to see you haste away so soon," would appeal more to the child mind than Wordsworth's "I wandered lonely as a cloud," and if we must have poetry about death surely "Fear no more the heat of the sun" ought to have been included. But perhaps the notes will carry the readers through. How nice it is to be told in regard to "Flow down, cold rivulet, to the sea," that "the poet is saying good-bye to the little brook that runs by the garden of his old home"—we can assure our readers that some of the notes are even more erudite than this.

We have received from Berkeley, California, the following singular notice, signed Adair Welcker, who modestly addresses it to all mankind, no doubt being perfectly sure in his own mind that there is nothing in human form which will not be affected by the fate that has befallen his book. We do not pretend to understand it:

It may interest those in various countries of the world who possess copies of the ninth edition of "A Dream of Realms Beyond Us" to know that the three hundred and over, of the copies that had not left San Francisco were in a building that, after the earthquake, was dynamited, and in the district that was, later on, burned. But, of the City Celestial, described in "A Dream of Realms Beyond Us," that is set in the clouds of heaven above the Golden Gate, and above a City than which, none less hypocritical has been in the world, there to be a door and entrance way through which Justice, coming down to the Cities of earth, will cause them to conform to, and become one with what is in the work; of the City whose tents, described in "A Dream of Realms Beyond Us," became all at once, after April 18, 1906, in their tens of thousands, duplicated in Golden Gate Park beneath it, it is needless to say; that, by earthquake or fire, the eternal foundations of that City through which, over the whole earth shall hereafter rule, not the bottom, and the wills of majorities, but the top, and the right, above all Kings and Rulers of earth—one Kingdom that shall go now into action and have no end—have not been, and are not to be, haken.

Motionless will they stand, while (until the horrors of hypocrisy in them cease, and indifference) London and Washington and other cities of earth that, on foundations of human blood, do part of their commerce, are caused, through Justice, to conform themselves to that which has been put into the City Celestial that is above it.

The autograph letter of Sir Walter Scott, which was sold this week at Sotheby's, was addressed to Anna Seward on receipt of her criticism of "Marmion." Praised by Samuel Johnson, and admired as a writer by Macaulay, Anna Seward, now completely forgotten, corresponded with Scott for some years before her death in 1809, and then made him her literary executor. The letter of Sir Walter is of peculiar interest: "It is long since I have been honoured with your kind letter containing so favourable and partial an analysis of 'Marmion.' It is now lying before me, and the contents are enough to warm my blood to the finger ends, although our coals are all expended, the snow lying two feet deep, and the roads impassable. My reason for transporting Marmion from Lichfield was to make good the minstrel prophecy of Coustance's song. Why I should ever have taken him there I cannot very well say. Attachment to the place—its locality with respect to Tamworth, the ancient seat of the Marmions; partly, perhaps, the whim of taking a slap at Lord Brooke en passant."

The town of Bordeaux, being justly proud of the fact that Montaigne was once mayor of the town, is publishing a definitive edition of the Essays. Owing to the author's corrections and additions the text of the essays varies considerably, but the new edition—which is under the care of M. Strowski, professor in the University of Bordeaux—will contain the complete text with notes on the variations. One of the older editions of that book "altogether without guile" contains in the preface a eulogy, by the "incomparable Thuanus," in which it is said that "while Montaigne was at Venice, he was elected Mayor of Bordeaux, which place was bestowed only upon persons of the first quality, and even the governors of the province thought it was an honour for them."

A new institution has just been founded in Venice for the revival of letters in that city, under the name of "L'Istituto Veneto di Arti Grafiche." Its object is to promote printing in all its various branches and to restore an art which was once of such widespread fame in Italy. That Venice should be chosen as one of the spots for such a purpose is peculiarly appropriate, for, as is well known, it was in Venice that printing was most warmly encouraged and developed when, after its invention in Germany, it was introduced into Italy. No less than one hundred and sixty-four printing presses were set up in Venice in the second half of the fifteenth century, and during the first thirty years that they were at work the number of books printed is estimated at two millions. Aldo Manuzio settled in Venice in 1489, and lived and worked there till his death in 1515. During those years he commenced the publication of the Aldine editions which his descendants carried on after him, and which have made his name famous throughout the world of letters.

The first term of the Academy of Dramatic Art under its new government by a council comprising Sir Squire Bancroft (the president), Mr. John Hare, Mr. Tree, Mr. George Alexander, Mr. Forbes Robertson, Mr. Cyril Maude, Mr. Arthur Bouchier, Mr. Pinero, and Mr. J. M. Barrie, has just ended. It has been a very successful session. There have been over eighty students. In addition to those given by the regular staff of instructors special rehearsals in the "Final School" have been held by Mr. John Hare in Act 1 of Mr. Pinero's play, The Profligate, by Mr. George Alexander in Act 1 of Mrs. Craigie's comedy, The Ambassador, and duologues from Old Heidelberg, and by Sir Squire and Lady Bancroft in Act 1 of Bulwer's comedy, Money. The usual rehearsal classes both for junior and senior students have been conducted by Mr. Lyall Swete and Mr. Fisher White, who have been appointed by the Council to the teaching staff of the Academy, and as many as six different characters have been studied and rehearsed by some of the students. An additional class in the "Final School" has been instructed by Mr. James Fernandez.

The term ended with the junior pupils giving final rehearsals of their term's work, and an interesting competition between Mr. Lyall Swete's and Mr. Fisher White's final classes, each of which gave a performance upon the Academy stage of In a Balcony, by Robert Browning. Mr. Forbes Robertson, Mr. Arthur Bouchier, and Captain Marshall were the judges.

There has been added to the curriculum a course of introductory lectures upon "The History of the English Theatre," which will be given every term to the new students. The practical result of the Academy's work is that many professional engagements have been secured by senior students either on tour or in London under various managements. The Council have appointed Mr. George Bancroft Administrator of the Academy. The next term will begin on September 29. All applications should be addressed to the Administrator, The Academy of Dramatic Art, 62 Gower Street, W.C.

At the last sitting of the Gogol committee the sculptor Andreeff was granted two thousand five hundred pounds to prepare a model of a monument to Gogol, life size, and five hundred pounds for superintending the casting. The whole monument will cost eight thousand pounds.

The new series of the Library World has started well. Without taking the credit for the extension, although we have consistently advised the publication of a list such as this, we are glad to see greatly increased space devoted to the "Book Selector." This department of the Library World is rendered more valuable by the careful annotations, and the addition of the marks of Mr. Brown's new classification. It is a pity that Mr. Brown has sent this system into the world without a name. Half the secret of success lies in the choice of a good title. We admit it is a difficult matter, but any sort of title is better than no name. Even such a title as the "Concrete" or the "Constant," or, better still, the "Individual" system would be preferable to its present unnatural condition. In addition to its "Selector" pages, the Library World devotes a good deal of space to bibliography.

The study of bibliography is an essential element of literary knowledge, and although Mr. Inkster's utopian forecast, that it will be eventually a compulsory subject in the school curriculum, may never be realised, there are undeniable signs that it is receiving more of the attention due to it. The forthcoming issue (1907) of the "Literary Year Book" will contain a complete bibliography of the prose and poetry of George Meredith, including his contributions to periodicals, and a complete classified list of the titles, publishers, prices, etc., of the various recent series of reprints, such as the World's Classics, Everyman's Library, etc.

NICOLETTE

I.

Do you remember how one summer day
You called me Aucassin? Sweet Nicolette,
I broke my prison-bars and rode away
Into the woods. Dearest, did you forget?
Where is the bower, where the magic spray
To heal my wounds withal? I wander yet.

II.

The weak would yield: only the strong recover
And, when a stronger presses, bend.
I marvel not that once I was your lover,
But that you dare to be my friend.

LITERATURE

ARISTOPHANES IN ENGLISH VERSE

The Birds of Aristophanes. Translations, introduction and commentary by B. B. ROGERS, M.A. (Bell, 10s. 6d.)

MANY years ago a brilliant young barrister published four plays of Aristophanes with critical and explanatory notes and a translation in verse which showed the learned world that it was richer by a scholar who was not only a worthy successor of the great textual critics of the English school, but also had a touch so light that he could rival Gilbert in his deft turning of verses and ingenious command of rhyme. He has for some time abandoned his profession, and has devoted his leisure to the production of a complete edition of the comedies of Aristophanes in six volumes. The Birds and Peace are to form vol. iii. Vol. v., Frogs and Ecclesiazusae, is now ready, price 15s. The Thesmophoriazusae may be had separately, price 7s. 6d. Mr. Rogers's notes are marked by great freshness and originality, and his commentary is as "durchgehend" as it is readable. He has in his introduction between sixty and seventy pages on the many birds mentioned in the play, and an interesting excursus on the music of the flute as representing the nightingale's song. The Birds was produced in 414 B.C., while the fate of the disastrous expedition to Sicily still trembled in the balance. Between it and the Peace, brought out in 421, there is no extant comedy. There is considerable resemblance between these two plays, especially in their idyllic character and in the exquisite lyrics which, as in Shakespeare, run like a golden thread through the delicate texture of the dramatic fabric. It is clear from the sixth book of Thucydides, as well as from Plutarch, that the Athenians intended the conquest of Sicily to be the first step in a grand scheme of imperial aggrandisement, including the subjugation not only of Hellas but of Carthage, the Italian Greek colonies and "many barbarians, Iberians and others." Aristophanes in the Birds gives a comic picture of the vaulting ambition of Alcibiades and other ancient Athenian empire-builders, who, be it observed, though not directly encouraged are not discouraged; for Nephelococcygia, though besieged by oracle-mongers, priests, poets, surveyors, act-mongers, etc., and all the parasites, which prey upon a nascent body politic, in the end turns out a brilliant success. So far and no farther the Birds is an allegory. Mr. Rogers rightly rejects the Teutonic attempts to lay a heavy hand on a film of gossamer, "to coarsen the delicate fibre of Aristophanic fantasy." The most ingenious of these is the essay of Professor Süvern read before the Royal Academy of Science at Berlin in 1827, in which he tries to persuade us that the gods in the play are the Spartans, the birds the Athenians, and the men the minor Hellenic states. After pointing out many difficulties and inconsistencies in this theory, Mr. Rogers shows how very similar arguments might be used to prove that the Tempest is an allegorical representation of the reign of Elizabeth and the defeat of the Spanish Armada. Such an hypothesis might be defended thus:

It is impossible that Shakespeare should have left unnoticed that mighty struggle, which, occurring when he was about twenty-four years of age, must have left an indelible impression on his mind. It requires but little penetration to see that the Virgin Miranda dwelling on her sea-girt isle was intended to represent the Virgin Queen dwelling in "this little isle" of England. Prospero, extirpated out of England but "prosperous" here, represents (not as Peisthetaerus the sophistical spirit of the age, but) the spirit of the Reformation. The inveterate enemy to Prospero is the King of Naples; and who was King of Naples at this time but Philip of Spain, the inveterate enemy of the Reformation? He is approaching the island, which is Prospero's last refuge, when his ship is wrecked by a storm raised against him by powers more than human.

The commentary is full of scholarly remarks on the language of the play, as well as interesting illustration of its matter, drawn from modern as well as ancient literature. But the chief feature is, of course, the translation, which shows all the point, force, and ingenuity which we expect from the editor. Here is the Bird-call by the Hoopoe and Nightingale. It has all the "heart" of the Shakespearean lyric:

(The land birds)

Come hither any bird with plumage like my own;
Come hither ye that batten on the acres newly sown,
On the acres by the farmers neatly sown,
And the myriad tribes that feed on the barley and the seed,
The tribes that lightly fly giving out a gentle cry;
And ye who round the clod in the furrow-riven sod
With voices sweet and low twitter flitter to and fro,
Singing, tio tio tio tiotinx.

And ye who in the gardens a pleasant harvest glean
Lurking in the branches of the ivy ever green;
And ye who top the mountains with gay and airy flight;
And ye who in the olive and the arbutus delight;
Come hither one and all, come flying to our call,
Triotó triotó tolotrinx.

(The sea birds)

Ye with the halcyons fitting delightedly
Over the surge of the infinite sea,
Come to the great Revolution awaiting us,
Hither, come hither, come hither to me.
Hither to listen to wonderful words
Hither we summon the taper-neck'd birds.
For hither has come a shrewd old file,
Such a deep old file, such a sharp old file,
His thoughts are new, and new deeds he'll do,
Come hither and confer with this shrewd old file.
Come hither! Come hither! Come hither!
Toro-toro-toro-torotinx!
Kickabau Kickabau!
Toro-toro-toro-lillitinx.

It would be pleasant to give examples of the translator's command over the various metres used in this delightful freak of poetic fancy; but the limits of a notice forbid. We must, however, find room for a specimen of the Parabasis, including the famous Cosmogony essayed by so many translators from Swinburne downwards:

There was Chaos at first and Darkness and Night and Tartarus vasty and dismal;
But the Earth was not there nor the Sky nor the Air, till at length in the bosom abysmal
Of Darkness an egg from the whirlwind conceived was laid by the sable-plumed Night,
And out of that egg as the Seasons revolved sprang Love the entrancing, the bright,
Love brilliant and bold with his pinions of Gold, like a whirlwind refulgent and sparkling!
Love hatched us commingling in Tartarus wide with Chaos, the murky,
the darkling,
And brought us above as the firstlings of Love, and first to the light we ascended;
There was never a race of Immortals at all till Love had the universe blended;
Then all things commingling together in Love, there arose the fair Earth and the Sky,
And the limitless Sea, and the race of the Gods, the Blessed who never shall die.
So we than the Blessed are older by far, and abundance of proof is existing
That we are the children of Love, for we fly unfortunate lovers assisting.

And many a man who has found to his cost his powers of persuasion have failed,
And his loves have abjured him for ever, again by the power of the Birds has prevailed;
For the gift of a quail or a porphyry rail or a Persian or goose will regain them.
And the chief of the blessings ye mortals enjoy by the help of the Birds ye obtain them
'Tis from us that the signs of the Seasons in turn, Spring, Winter and Autumn are known—
When from Libya the crane flies clanging again—'tis the time for the seed to be sown,
And the skipper may hang up his rudder awhile and sleep after all his exertions,
And Orestes may weave him a wrap to be warm when out on his thieving excursions.
Then cometh the kite with its hovering flight of the advent of Spring to tell,
And the Spring sheep-shearing begins, and next your woollen attire you sell,
And buy a lighter and daintier garb when you note the return of the swallow.
Thus your Ammon, Dodona and Delphi we are, we are also your Phœbus Apollo:
For whatever you do, if a trade you pursue or goods in the market are buying,
Or the wedding attend of a neighbour or friend, first you look to the Birds and their flying.
And whenever you of omen or augury speak, 'tis a bird you are always repeating:
A rumour 's a bird and a sneeze is a bird, and so is a word or a meeting,
A servant 's a bird and an ass is a bird. It must therefore assuredly follow
That the Birds are to you—I protest it is true—your prophetic divining Apollo.

THOMAS ARNOLD

Studies of Roman Imperialism. By W. T. ARNOLD, M.A. Edited by EDWARD FIDDES, M.A. (Manchester: at the University Press, 7s. 6d. net.)

WORKING behind the visible forces of our time there is a regiment of nameless men who, refusing to fall in with the modern love of advertisement, nevertheless exert an immeasurable influence upon their contemporaries. They are birds of the night. When streets are hushed beneath the stars and the sober citizen asleep, they are toiling through "flimsy" and preparing opinions to guide the world at its awaking. But they cling to anonymity and make their journal what the State was to the antique Roman citizen. They may see themselves quoted, but it is always as the paper, never by their own names. Of such was the writer of the book before us. From the excellent memoir of her brother prefixed to the "Studies of Roman Imperialism" by Mrs. Humphry Ward, we are able to see that Arnold was typical of his profession. The word journalist, we are afraid, does not gain in dignity with the advance of time, indeed it stinks in the nostrils of the more fastidious. They associate it so much with the personality of a pushing Paul Pry whose business in life is to worm himself into the secrets of others, to make sensational copy wherever it is possible, and to advertise himself on each occasion that turns up. Moreover he has not, as a rule, any reverence for the language that he must use daily. His business, as he himself recognises it, is not to maintain the purity of the mother tongue, but to be effective at any cost. With the merits of any public question he is not to any large extent concerned, his sole object being to see it from some point of view that will impress the crowd. Yet it would be extremely unjust to a most honourable and useful profession if they were all lumped together under one category. There are many newspapers in England, and on the whole the most influential are those which control individual vagaries, and, as a rule, they are also more prosperous than those which flaunt the individual's name. They withstand the temptation to be sensational, do not encourage self-advertisement among their writers, and day by day print articles that stand exclusively on their own merits and owe nothing to the signature of a famous name. Arnold was one of those who preferred that way of doing things. Like all of his family he had an innate love of scholarship which had been cherished and developed at a public school and the university. His father was the second son of Dr. Arnold of Rugby and the younger brother of Matthew Arnold. He was of those who answered to the movement in favour of manual labour which made itself felt in certain circles during the first quarter of Queen Victoria's reign, when it will be remembered even Carlyle himself expressed a wish that he could lay down the pen and depart into the backwoods of America, to spend his time henceforth in felling trees. Many of the lesser lights who moved round Carlyle expressed themselves still more strongly in favour of manual labour, and Thomas Arnold took the doctrine so seriously that he left this country for New Zealand in 1847. Of course he found that he had been wrong. The poor scholar steeped in George Sand, Emerson and Carlyle, was not made for the rough and tumble of colonial life, and disillusion and disappointment followed. Luckily for him however, at that time Sir William Denison, Governor of Tasmania, hearing that a relative of Arnold's was in New Zealand, offered him the post of Chief Inspector of Schools for Tasmania. Within a few months Arnold took up his new position and he was married at his new home on June 15, 1850. He seems to have been of a temperament that was intellectually restless, and those pleasant years were not to continue long. In 1856 he joined the Church of Rome and had to give up his inspectorship, and sailed home practically without prospects. Within a few months however, he was offered the Professorship of English Literature in the new Catholic University of Dublin of which Dr. Newman was the head, and for the next five years was fixed in Ireland. During that time the children spent most of their holidays at Fox How, Thomas Arnold's old home in the Lake District, and of those days Mrs. Humphry Ward gives a very pretty description.

The delights of the garden; of its brook, which could be dammed and bridged by the third generation, as Matthew Arnold and his brothers and sisters had dammed and bridged it in the second; the charm of its wooded knolls, its wild strawberry beds, its rocks where the wild pinks grew, its hidden thickets of wild raspberries, its border of wood above the rippling or swirling Rotha; the humours of its old gardener, Banks, who gave out the Psalm and hymn-tunes on Sunday, in Rydal Chapel, with a tuning-fork; its beloved birch-tree, its outlook on the deep bosom of Fairfield, its roses and its rhododendrons—these things sank deep into young hearts, and William Arnold's love of the Lakes, and of all the detail of their streams and hills, must be dated from these childish days.

The principal thing, to notice however, is that the boy was brought up in an atmosphere of letters. He does not seem to have developed much originality, but rather to have become a careful and sound thinker. In poetry he fell under the influence of Rossetti. Of his life at Oxford as coach and lecturer to the women students, there is nothing particular to be said. His real career began when Mr. C. P. Scott, editor of the Manchester Guardian, came to Oxford in search of recruits for his paper. Mr. Humphry Ward introduced him to Arnold and his removal to Manchester followed. His life there was typical of that of a first-class provincial journalist. He was greatly interested in the political controversies that raged during the 'eighties and seems gradually to have been brought on to write leaders and reviews; to criticise pictures and music and to perform the other miscellaneous duties attached to such a post as that which he held. Being at Manchester he made its interests his own.

The vast machinery of Manchester trade and manufacture, its economic bearings, and its human implications; Manchester art and music; or the plays given at Manchester theatres; the neighbouring country, its moors and streams, and woods on which the mills encroached year by year; Lancashire dialect and Lancashire poets; Lancashire birds and flowers; the growth of Owens College, the development of an Art Gallery, the preservation of local traditions; to all these matters, great and small, he gave his eager mind almost from the first.

It might have been thought that the performance of these multifarious tasks would have ended by crippling and enfeebling his mind, as few men are able to combine the man of letters with the journalist, though there have been brilliant exceptions such as John Morley, Frederick Greenwood, and Walter Bagehot. He kept himself from falling into this slough by persistence and assiduity in his historical studies: that is to say, he was a specialist as well as a newspaper writer. Others have kept the divine spark alight by their devotion to their leisure hours to belles lettres, but though an insatiable reader he developed no capacity for becoming a really great writer. Mr. C. E. Montague, who contributes a memoir of his middle life, shows the limitations of his style in a passage that is well worth quoting.

Arnold would have been quick to show that his prose is not of the very best—that it is not exquisite; that, though there is rhythm, there are no new finds in rhythm, none of the prose melodies that ripple, trail, or climb to the ear in ways of their own; that the phrase might be richer in second intentions, that there might be harmonics to the notes; that the emphasis with its frontal attack, the open laying out of the antitheses, the whole technical affinity to Macaulay, preclude the best choiceness. Yet it is good workaday prose; it has connection; not the connection of conjunctive particles; it coheres organically; the paragraph, not the sentence, is the unit of thought, the strong sense crossing in its stride the little breaks at which bad writers fuss with their little bridges. The style, again, is what the craft call fluffiness—there is no inky humming and haling, or clearing of the literary throat; and the whole is a-tingle with an unbookish ring; you would think that he said it aloud while he wrote, and indeed it reads as his talk sounded, and one hears in it the rise and fall of his eager voice pressing its points.

In that paragraph we seem to see the reason why he was not able to break away from journalism altogether. The lack of the highest quality in his prose style is really akin to that dependence on the opinion of others which prevented him from being an original thinker in the world of politics. He was only a loyal and staunch follower, at one time of Mr. Forster and always of Mr. Gladstone. Yet when we come to sum up his character and achievements it must be admitted by all that he added to the dignity and honour of the profession to which he belonged.

THE ART OF HENRY JAMES

The Novels of Henry James. A study. By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY. (Putnam's, 5s.)

WE can picture the "general reader" thinking of one of Mr. Henry James's novels what Mr. Herbert Paul once said of one of Matthew Arnold's poems—that "it probably means something." The puzzle arises, of course, from the extreme caution with which Mr. James puts pen to paper. It has been said of him that he gropes his way through the English language like a blind man tapping with a stick; but that, whether malice inspired it or not, is an injustice. The ruling passion with Mr. James is indubitably the desire to make a plain straightforward statement; but he has a higher conception of the nature of a plain straightforward statement than the rest of us. He knows that few, if any, words have a hard and fixed significance, that propositions apparently simple, may really be as elastic as india-rubber and convey quite different meanings to different minds, and that even a truth is no better than a half-truth when it is only examined from a single point of view. He finds it necessary, therefore, to define his words, to qualify his propositions, and, as it were, to crane his neck and squint, in order to get glimpses of the truth from several angles simultaneously. Gladstone, as we all know, did the same, and was currently accused of intending to deceive, when his actual purpose was to explain his position beyond the possibility of misunderstanding. Mr. Henry James is, in this respect, the worthiest of Gladstone's disciples, though, dealing with subtler emotions than any to which Gladstone ever appealed, he has to cope with more embarrassing difficulties than Gladstone ever faced. He feels the need of anticipating objections, and clearing up misapprehensions before they arise; he feels also that he cannot make clear exactly what he means unless at the same time he points out, by cunning parentheses and other tricks of style, exactly what he does not mean. That is the reason why, though he has spent the whole of his literary life in trying to make plain straightforward statements, the general reader is a little apt to declare that he has never yet succeeded in making one; and that is also a reason why there might be some advantage in forming a Henry James Society for the elucidation of his message to the world. Pending the formation of such a Society, the general reader will feel a certain amount of gratitude to Miss Elizabeth Cary for undertaking the task of interpretation, single-handed.

We say "a certain amount of gratitude" advisedly, for Miss Cary is not quite an ideal interpreter. The ideal interpreter of obscure literature to the general reader would be a person like the coach in "The Cambridge Freshman" who, for the benefit of poll-men, decided all the knotty points on which more learned doctors disagreed. When one learned doctor said that the meaning of a difficult passage "might be this," and another, not less learned, opined that "it might be that," the coach, it will be remembered, told the poll-men "what it was." There is none of that lucid cocksureness about Miss Cary's commentary. The mantle of the master whom she expounds has in some degree fallen upon her. Like him, instead of boldly laying down the law, she fumbles and feels her way to cloudy and dubious conclusions; and, if there were any question of facing an examination, we should hesitate to advise students to get up their subjects from her book. It contains no precipitated phrases, no luminous generalisations to linger in the memory. Yet the points are there, though they have to be dug for, and her work may help the the beginner to see of what forces Mr. James is the product, and what, in a general way, he is driving at. As Heine was said to be a Parisian born in Germany, so he may be said to be a cosmopolitan born in Boston. And to be born in Boston was, in George Gissing's memorable phrase, to be "born in exile." That is the first clue to Mr. Henry James, as any one may see who will re-read his Life of Nathaniel Hawthorne. Mr. James was drawn to Europe as the provincial is drawn to the capital. He tries to adopt, at one and the same time, the mental attitude of the native and the stranger—to note picturesquely the contrasts which strike the former, and yet to feel, with the latter, that he has lived there all his life. Unable to tolerate the novelty of the Western, he can never feel quite at his ease with the traditions and antiquities of the Eastern world. Naturally, therefore, he likes to write of the American of various types getting used to Europe, and to depict the clash, or rather the contact, of the two civilisations. He wants to make plain straightforward statements upon the subject, but, approaching it in a complicated frame of mind, finds it very difficult to combine plainness with accuracy. His frame of mind has grown more rather than less complicated with the years, with the result that he is now perhaps farther than ever from the plain straightforward statement which he has, for the last forty years, been trying desperately hard to make.

No doubt he finds it the harder to make it because, as Miss Cary points out, the things which he regards as important are not those which are visible upon the surface. Perhaps it would be too much to say that men and women are not interesting to him until he sees them beginning to get bored; but at all events he proceeds on the theory that the fundamentally significant problems are those which do not arise until the struggle for existence is over. With the actual battle of life—its anguish and its triumphs—he deals very little. He seems, indeed, to regard the battle as a stern necessity too often standing between man and the things that really matter; and the spectacle that absorbs and fascinates him is that of men and women seeing what they can make of their lives after the battle has been won and the sordid necessity removed. It is, indeed, the ultimate problem, though only the select few get near enough to it to feel that it poignantly concerns them. It is the problem which Mill faced in the "crisis" of his youth, when he told himself that, even if he achieved all the objects for which he was working, he would derive no particular satisfaction from the achievement—the crisis from which he was delivered, as the Autobiography relates, by discovering from Wordsworth's poetry what would be the permanent source of happiness when all possible material improvements in the condition of the world should have been effected. It is the problem that the Preacher was facing when he wrote that all was vanity and vexation of spirit. It is the problem of the men of forty and the women of thirty who look down the hill without need to take anxious thought for the morrow, but have lost some of their early illusions. To say that is to say that it is a problem not at all unworthy of Mr. Henry James's subtle analysis. He has not solved it, of course; he has not even made a plain straightforward statement about it. But he has stated and restated it, and presented it in innumerable shapes with marvellous analytical power, and almost uncanny insight into the mechanism of the human mind.

Heroes of Exile. By HUGH CLIFFORD. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

Rois sans Couronnes. Par LE BARON MARC DE VILLIERS DU TERRAGE. (Paris: Perrin, 5 francs.)

THE Heroes of Exile, whom Mr. Clifford has rescued from forgotten records or merely from family tradition, have all one bond of union. They possess that chief attribute of the Happy Warrior, who could "turn his necessity to glorious gain"; and that is the last art of life. Mr. Clifford writes with reverence and great sympathy, and he succeeds in his aim, set forth simply in his preface:

The stories in this book . . . are not themselves romances. They are history not fiction; waifs and strays of history that have been gathered lovingly into a new habitation; and it has been my aim throughout to make my heroes live for you again, as once of old they lived so that . . . you may realise them not as shadow-shapes, but as men of flesh and blood and bone like the rest of us.

Men they are, and men who have lived finely against fearful odds without the help of that final accident which brings success and fame. Their deeds have not become common property and have not won the public's acclamation. And, accordingly, there is a fragrance, a kind of restful freshness about their lives which Fame would have taken from them. For Fame is apt to vulgarise by its touch. A melody is cheapened by popular approval: the vulgarity of the street-organs from which it is wound out and the dust of the street-corners at which it is whistled mingle with the beauty which it once possessed and spoil it. So Fame can bespatter the famous, until his real features are hidden by a mask of praise and prejudice, and he becomes an idol wrapped in tawdry and tinsel, the mob's own favours. The mob acclaims success; but it is the vitality concealed in the effort which matters and is worthy of acclamation.

M. le Baron Marc de Villiers du Terrage differs very much from Mr. Clifford in his treatment. He records drily the splendid lunacies of his uncrowned kings: he looks upon them with a twinkling eye and calls them in his preface: "assez minces aventuriers, "miniscules Buonapartes," and laments that he has only one "gracieuse figure féminine": "Quelle jolie page d'historiette serait pourtant la conquête du Monomotapa par quelque Chevalière d'Eon!" are his last words. He sees the madness of their wild genius: Mr. Clifford the poetry that is inherent in all effort, in all conflict with the inexorable forces.

And so, though the titles inspire with the same thrill (and "Rois sans Couronne" is more expressive than "Heroes in Exile"), yet the pageant of the persons chosen by each passes by in an oddly different manner:

and Marie David, Comte de Ray and King of the Sedangs, who appears in both, is scarcely recognisable, except for the dull facts of his name and of his actual exploits. It is hard to believe that the extravagant impostor of the cynical Baron is the magnetic personality who crowned himself king of a little tract of land and some natives, issued orders which were eagerly accepted by careful business men, and declared himself at war with France, without a smile, colossal humourist that he was: France treated him as seriously as he was obliged to treat his own escape.

And this Marie is the meeting-point, from which either pageant wheels away; Mr. Clifford's select company quietly to the land of great dreams, the Baron's filibusterers to noisy enterprise and odd exploits. For fifty years Chun had lived the life of a Buddhist monk, thinking high thoughts away from the world, but unable to rid himself of the sins of desire and of anger, unable to forget that his brother usurped the crown of Siam, which was his own by right, and that the country was suffering under his bad sway. "Ah, if I were king!" was his continued thought, and often was Chun obliged to confess this sin of evil desire to his brother monks, according to the rule of the Order. At last, just when he had fought his way almost into the realm of abstract thought and peace, the moment came when a troop of gaily clad cavaliers crowded into the quiet, bare monastery and, announcing the death of his usurping brother, acclaimed Chun king. and Chun the monk went out with them to take up the full burden of sovereignty and redress his people's wrongs. He became Somdet Phra, the King of Siam, and during the twenty-two years of his reign he toiled to fulfil the oath of even justice which he took at the drinking of the holy waters, and prosperity came to the people. Dying, he was wrapped in the cloak of a Buddhist monk once more. Chun was a hero. And scarcely less heroic, though in a different way, was the life of Fernão Lopez. He sinned the blackest treachery, and for his treachery he lost his ears and nose; his thumbs were cut off; he became a pitiable mockery to all men. At length he escaped to the little island of St. Helena, and there he lived alone for thirty years, until he became famous to the men on passing ships, who tried to catch him as a curiosity, until the King of Portugal commanded that he should be left undisturbed. In those days only the Pope could absolve a man from a crime such as Lopez had committed, and Lopez, in spite of the publicity from which he could not hide, journeyed to Rome that his mind might be put at rest by absolution; he was taken back to his lonely island, again at the king's command, and there he died in peace on the same island of St. Helena, on which Napoleon, who had touched the pinnacle of human greatness, "ate out his mighty angry heart" in despair.

Such is the type of Mr. Clifford's heroes: and there is something about their lives—for each in his own way "found comfort in himself and in his cause," and "turned his necessity to glorious gain"—which makes one repeat meditatively:

This is the happy Warrior; this is he
That every Man in arms should wish to be; just as M. le Baron's dry records of the great fellows who swaggered to little kingdoms, or blustered into a moment's power, or founded colonies in which to carry out some huge, mad scheme, for all their bluster and madness and noise inspirit one irresistibly to cry aloud:

Busk up your plaids, my lads
Cock up your bonnets
Da Capo.

THE RELIGION OF PANTHEISM

Pantheism: its Story and Significance. By J. ALLENSON PICTON.
(Constable, 1s.)

WE remember having once read an appreciation of Mr. Picton in a Sunday paper which spoke of him as one who had "passed through Materialism and come out on the other side." On the other side of Materialism lies, it appears, Pantheism; but Pantheism is not necessarily a religion, or, indeed, anything more than a re-statement of the materialistic position. Between any kind of Dualism and any kind of Monism the mind distinguishes; whereas it can easily be argued that the distinction between two kinds of Monism is merely verbal. To say that matter is God is neither to add to our knowledge of its attributes nor (from the point of view of the materialist) to introduce any fresh theory of the Universe. It is merely (the materialist would say) to give matter a new name. Nor does it, from any point of view, constitute a moral advance. Prayer, from the standpoint of Pantheism, is merely, as has been said, "talking to oneself"; and, if we start with the hypothesis that the universe is already as divine as it is capable of being, we deprive ourselves of any standard whereby to contrast or measure good and evil. Pantheism, indeed, was, in its origin, not a religious but a philosophical conception, and flourished, in its early stages, in conjunction with superstitions logically incompatible with it, such as Animism and Fetichism. As Mr. Picton puts it:

Little or no attempt was made to substitute the contemplation of the Eternal for the worship of mediator divinities. Thus, in the same spirit in which Socrates ordered the sacrifice of a cock to Æsculapius for his recovery from the disease of mortal life, philosophical Pantheists, whether Egyptian, or Greek, or even Indian, satisfied their religious instincts by hearty communion with the popular worship of traditional gods.

Nor is it difficult to discover modern Pantheists who do the same. The case of Robertson of Brighton, quoted by Mr. Picton, will serve as well as any. "What," Robertson asked, "is this world itself but the form of Deity whereby the manifoldness and beauty of His mind manifests itself?" That is Pantheism, or it is meaningless. But Robertson was a clergyman of the Church of England, and the Church of England teaches Dualism—teaches that man is separate from God, estranged from God, and can only be reconciled to God by the acceptance of a sacrifice. The two doctrines are in glaring contradiction.

The question to which the average reader will demand an answer from Mr. Picton is this: Pantheism being, as he avers, in its origin a philosophical conception, how is religion, in the sense of morality touched by emotion, to be got out of it? It certainly is not derived from it by him, any more than by Spinoza, through any process of logical deduction. Acquiescence in the inevitable is all that the theory, dispassionately considered, can suggest; and the only possible reply to it is that human nature itself is up in arms against the inference. The old theologians told us that man is by nature depraved. It is at least as true to say that man is by nature religious; and, indeed, the former proposition may be held to contain and imply the latter. This does not mean, of course, that any specific moral ideas are, as the Intuitionists used to say, "innate." It means not only that man is capable of passing moral judgments, but that he cannot help doing so—that, whether he be a good man or a bad man, he is compelled to think in terms of morality touched by emotion. The nature of the thoughts differs from age to age and from country to country. We have only to compare the gospel of passive resistance preached by Count Tolstoy with the "Do not hesitate to shoot" gospel preached by a military commander in order to see that. But the mode of thought is common even to cases so flagrantly opposed as these. They agree in advocating with emotion something that "ought to be" in place of something that "is"; and so do we all, if not when we criticise our own conduct, at least when we criticise the conduct of our neighbours. And to say this is, of course, to say that there exists a human instinct with which every philosophy must, whether logically or illogically, in the long run make terms. To put it differently: Materialism and Pantheism have alike to reckon with the "God-intoxicated man." It was that factor which, over-riding the syllogistic logic, created the Religion of Humanity out of Positive Science. It is equally that factor which caused Spinoza to see so much more in Pantheism than was seen either by Xenophanes or Sir Leslie Stephen; and a considerable portion of the truth seems to be summed up when we say that Comte was the Spinoza of Positivism and Spinoza the Comte of Pantheism. In each case alike we have a God-intoxicated man, throwing the syllogistic logic to the winds and imposing the religious conceptions of his own mind upon a philosophical conception which does not contain them. It does not follow that they are wrong in doing so because the forms of words in which they try to mask their inconsistencies are not proof against all the weapons in the armoury of the critic.

Mr. Allenson Picton's form of words is as follows :

If the Pantheist in these days be asked, "What interpretation do you propose?" his answer is, "I propose none. I take things as they are. In their totality they are unknowable, as, indeed, even science finds they are in their infinitesimal parts." But we need not on this account lose "the divinity that shapes our ends." For, between the infinite and the infinitesimal the human experience realises itself in surroundings which, when observed and reflected on, make the impression of ordered relation of parts. By the necessity of our finite and individual existence as centres of action—a necessity of which we can give no account—we present those relations to ourselves in forms of time and space. Then, when our experience is large enough and ripe enough, being enriched and stimulated by the stored-up experience of humanity, as recorded in tradition, custom, Bibles, and Epics, we attain to the moral sense, and realise that we are bound to be loyal to something greater than self. That "greater" may be the tribe, the nation, humanity, or God.

The important word in this profession of faith is "realise." Its use is an appeal to the tribunal which overrules all logical demonstration. A materialist might describe it as the hysterical cry of the God-intoxicated man; but the answer to that would be that we are all, materialists included, God-intoxicated more or less. Our intelligence being finite, we are bound to fall into inconsistencies when we try to express our apprehensions of the Infinite in propositions suitable for syllogistic use; but these apprehensions are, nevertheless, facts which colour our interpretation of all philosophies. It is unprofitable to argue whether they ought to do so or not. They are bound to do so because they constitute a part of our intellectual machinery.

THE METAPHYSICS OF PRAGMATISM

Idola Theatri. By HENRY STURT. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

SOME books are interesting in themselves: others derive such interest as they have from the movement of thought in which they have their origin. Mr. Sturt's volume belongs to this second class. It is a child of the most recent and (philosophically speaking) fashionable "ism" that the new century has produced—known, by some as Humanism, and by others as Pragmatism. Not that Pragmatism is so monstrous a growth as to have no proper philosophical pedigree. On the contrary, with a little trouble it could produce an eminently respectable genealogical tree. It is however only in our twentieth century that it has risen into prominence, and faced the world with a claim to recognition as a distinctive, and indeed a militant, doctrine.

To different minds [says Mr. Sturt] the pragmatist or humanist movement doubtless makes a different appeal: to mine its value lies in its recognition of personal striving, and its suggestion of a philosophy of the future which will treat personal striving as the central fact of our experience.

What is this new philosophy for which "personal striving" is to be the central explanatory fact?

Well, it has many definitions. Here is one, from Professor James—who is not so much the parent of Pragmatism as its most distinguished godfather:

Humanism conceives the more "true" as the more "satisfactory"; or defines the true as that which gives the maximum combination of satisfactions.

And here is another, from Dr. Schiller, who is, more perhaps than any one else, at once the parent and the high priest of the new philosophy:

Pragmatism is an assertion of the sway of human valuations over every region of our experience.

Or again:

Pragmatism is the doctrine that "truths" are "values," and that "realities" are arrived at by processes of valuation.

Now, what does all this mean? Everything will depend upon the interpretation. To say that "truths are values" may be to say something that will disturb as little as it illumines us. Nor, indeed, if the statement that "the true is the satisfactory" means merely that, as the untrue must sooner or later come into conflict with experience, we cannot rest in it, need we pay the doctrine the compliment of so much as disagreeing with it.

But Pragmatism, at least in the minds of Dr. Schiller and his immediate followers, means more than this. It means, not merely (for in that we should all agree) that we can rest in a doctrine because it is true; but that a doctrine is true because, and in no other sense than that, we can rest in it.

Let us be clear about this. "Because" is a dangerous word to play with: and, except we are upon our guard, the causa cognoscendi is apt to cheat us into treating it as a causa essendi. So it would be well to put the point once more, in a slightly different form. We should most of us be ready to recognise that the "satisfactoriness" of a judgment is a ground for our believing it to be true—is, in that sense, a "criterion" of its truth, if you will—; but we should resent the attempt to transform this recognition into the doctrine that the truth of a judgment consists in, and is nothing more than, such "satisfactoriness." Yet this is precisely the step that the Pragmatist has taken. Taking his stand on human experience, and profoundly impressed with the part which will and purpose play in the determination of all activity (including, of course, the activity of thought), he has come to reject the notion of a Reality to which our thought, in its effort to be "true," has merely to "conform," and boldly maintains that the true is simply that which satisfies our purposes and desires—that the Real is, in that sense, what we make it. Reality (and this, as we have seen, is the aspect of Pragmatism which especially appeals to Mr. Sturt) is to be interpreted "in terms of personal striving." An "incredible metaphysical doctrine" indeed—as a not unsympathetic critic, Mr. S. H. Mellone, has called it—this view that the real is nothing but what we make it. And "incredible" are the metaphysical conceptions by the aid of which Dr. Schiller and his school attempt to work out this theory of a Reality, or a Truth, "in the making." Reality, for them, is nothing but experience: and experience is the "merely determinable," a plastic something-nothing, a bare matter or ύλη, to which it is in our power to give either one form or another. No doubt, at any given moment the body of our experience, that is, our Reality, has a determinate form: but that form is the result of a long process of "experimenting," a process in which ideas and principles have suggested themselves, have led to action, and have brought in their train either satisfaction or disappointment. It is this satisfaction or disappointment that has determined, has indeed actually "constituted," truth for us. What has satisfied desire (taking that word in its widest sense) has become pro tanto true. What were in the first instance "postulates," mere suggestions or working hypotheses, have become in the evolution of experience "axioms"; have become, that is, fundamental principles of an organised body of truth. Some have fallen out by the way. They have failed to satisfy; and they have, in consequence, failed to survive.

Such is, in outline, the metaphysical doctrine wherein, as Dr. Schiller somewhat noisily proclaims, philosophical salvation is, in the future, to be found. It would take us far beyond the scope of this article were we to attempt to press upon this doctrine the many difficulties which it raises. We cannot, however, refrain from putting just two questions. What is it, in the first place, that suggests the tentative hypotheses which compete in experience for survival, if not the determinate character of some reality other than the apprehending consciousness? And what, in the second place, are we to make of a "merely determinable" matter of experience, in the sense of a "matter" which has positively no character of its own? It is useless to throw us back on the Aristotelian conception of ὑλη. Aristotle himself was, at least to some extent, aware of the difficulties which await the attempt to build up an organised reality out of a primary undifferentiated matter: and, while he holds firmly to the correlative conceptions of ὑλη and εἶδος, matter and form, as aspects under which all concrete reality can be viewed, his ὑλη is still not so much the absolutely as the relatively undifferentiated—a "matter," that is, which, as compared with the more highly differentiated product into which it is capable of entering, is relatively undifferentiated, but which, in so far as it exists at all, does so in virtue of some determinate character. And, indeed, whatever Aristotle may or may not have held, we cannot to-day escape the difficulties which our own metaphysic may raise by taking shelter behind his name.

We are far from suggesting that any metaphysic should be rejected because it raises difficulties. Every metaphysic does that. But at least, if it is to stand, it must face the difficulties squarely; and it must at least satisfy us that its own peculiar difficulties are fewer, or less disturbing, than those of any rival metaphysic which it may claim to supersede. We cannot feel that, judged by this standard, Pragmatism has made good its claim.

It is to this Pragmatic movement, and to the controversy to which it has given rise, that we owe Mr. Sturt's book, "Idola Theatri." Mr. Sturt is sincere, and in his way independent: but the structure of the book is slight; and in closing it we are haunted by the suspicion that its author has failed to master the doctrines he attacks.

Intellectualism, Absolutism, Subjectivism—these are the three leading professorial fallacies with which Mr. Sturt is concerned. Intellectualism, according to our author—the doctrine, that is, which identifies Reality with Thought—fails to meet the demands of the "plain man." The "Real" is more than the "intelligible"; and thought divorced from the desires and purposes of our daily life is an abstraction which leads direct to misconception in Metaphysics, in Logic, and in Ethics. Of the chapter which deals with this particular Idolon we can only say that it seems to us typical of the book as a whole, both in its good qualities and in its bad. We must content ourselves with one or two quotations. In the first Mr. Sturt is arguing ("pragmatically") that Truth is relevant to Interest, and that what is true-enough-for-our-purposes is Truth:

In ordinary or non-scientific inquiry the amount of correspondence necessary to constitute truth is extremely variable. Being very hungry we ask for bread. If we are told that there is bread in the cupboard, and go to look, we treat the answer as true if we find in the cupboard something near enough to satisfy our want. We do not care if what we find does not answer to the technical definition of bread, but should rather be called "damper." On the other hand, we should treat the answer as false if the person to whom we addressed the inquiry told us, knowing we were hungry, that there was bread in the cupboard, and we found a loaf there which from some accident had been rendered uneatable (p. 51).

Now, this is either sheer nonsense, or it means that a judgment is true if we are willing to treat it as such. And that also is sheer nonsense.

The second quotation is the following:

If we were challenged to produce our own ideal of knowledge we ought, I think, to lay it down that the ideal must be in any case human. . . . No one needs a universal education: Browning's Grammarian who "decides not to live but know" was a foolish pedant, like Goethe's Faust before he took his regenerating plunge into life. The ideal for each man is to do as much creative thinking as he gets opportunity for, and to have acquired by docility as much instructional knowledge as will help in the creative function (p. 57).

Here again we get the notion of the true-enough-for-my-purposes—used this time to suggest an ideal of knowledge. The ideal is to know just as much, or rather just as little, as we can get along with. This is barely an exaggeration of Mr. Sturt's position; and we must perhaps be pardoned for somewhat losing patience.

One more passage. Pragmatism, it will be remembered, tends to interpret the world in terms of "personal striving." This principle Mr. Sturt applies to the Analysis of Art—with the following result:

The sentiment of beauty attaches primarily to things man makes or understands the making of. I doubt if this reference to making is absent from even the most passive-seeming exclamation, "How beautiful." Suppose it to be uttered by a merely non-performing connoisseur as he looks at a sunset. Fully to understand his mental attitude we must remember that beneath its passivity it is penetrated by experiences of production; the sunset will probably suggest pictures seen. Even if it does not, if no thought of Claude or Turner crosses his mind, yet he would hardly appreciate the view unless its lines and tints were attached to an apperceptive system of ideas which has been formed in his mind by contact with artists and works of art.

Now, that constructive efforts of one's own do develop and intensify artistic appreciation no one can doubt: but to make "reference to making" essential to such appreciation, and to imply that associations with the production of pictures determine one's feeling for scenery, is, surely, to apply the principle of "personal striving" in a way that makes it merely ridiculous.

The succeeding chapters, on Absolutism and Subjectivism, complete Mr. Sturt's account of his leading Idola. These are followed by an outline of the course of German philosophy from Kant to Hegel: and the concluding chapters are devoted to a criticism of Green (whom Mr. Sturt strangely describes as a "timorous thinker"), Bradley and Bosanquet. Much of Mr. Sturt's criticism of Green's doctrine of Freedom seems to us not without point. It is otherwise when he comes to Green's "Reduction to the Spiritual Principle":

If Green had wished to maintain that relations are, by reason of their presence to God's mind, real for men, he should have proved that God can enter the human "universe of conversation"; God must talk to and act upon men after the manner of the Old Testament. [The italics are ours.]

He should also, says Mr. Sturt, have "explained why, if the divine consciousness constitutes reality for men, men share so scantily in the wealth of the divine experience." When we read this we are tempted to think that Mr. Sturt has hardly entered into the spirit of Green's Metaphysic with the sympathy necessary to any criticism which is to be penetrating.

Here we must leave Mr. Sturt, though we should be glad, had we the space, to say something of his attack on Bradley's treatment of Inference. That treatment remains for us as suggestive and helpful after reading Mr. Sturt as before.

We should wish to end by frankly recognising the service which Pragmatism, as representing a revolt against an exaggerated Intellectualism, or an over-facile Idealism, is doing to Philosophy. We recognise the value of the appeal to a complete experience; of the insistence on the teleological character of all our activity; of the prominence assigned to the Will in any theory of the significance of human life. These are not new points; but they need to be re-affirmed from time to time. And Pragmatism is re-affirming them. But "satisfaction of desire" and "personal striving" are inadequate metaphysical principles. And our soul rises against a philosophy which, in any sense of the words, identifies the true, or the real, with what-serves-our-purpose.

THE MAGIC OF WORDS

THE other day a certain poem, or snatch of a poem, kept running through my brain continually. And, after a while, I grew, from unconscious repetition of the familiar words and cadences, to reflecting on what, after all, gave to this simple combination of simple phrases its wonderful haunting power.

The poem in question was "A Lyke-Wake Dirge":

This æ nighte, this æ nighte,
This æ nighte and alle,
Fire and sleet and candle-light,
And Christ receive thy saule.

It is perhaps the most perfect of examples of that immortal magic of words which is found at its highest in our early ballad-poetry. The words are of the simplest; yet how could they be bettered by any refinement of art? How, one might almost say, could they conceivably be altered?

Such haunting phrases, such unforgettable refrains, leap to the mind at once from the storehouse of ballad-lore. The lady who "tore her ling lang yellow hair, And knelt at Barthram's side"—Hardicanute, when "stately stept he east the ha' And stately stept he west"—what is it, what unanalysable quality that gives to all time so vivid a picture of those dead figures? So with a hundred others—natural, simple, set forth in such wise that an imaginative child, more perhaps than any adult, will take them at once and for ever into its soul.

We come, then, to the eternal consideration of the poetic vocabulary—in a spirit, be it noted, of all humility, with no intention of formulating rules or systems. It seems certain that, with the renewed cult of pure English models, that fearful and wonderful thing, the word labelled "poetic" in the dictionaries of a century ago, has been banished from the realm of song. At one lamentable period of literature, for instance, no one thought of using in verse that good, sounding monosyllable "sea." One must speak always of the "main"—generally the "azure main"—of the "deep," the "wave," or at the very least the "ocean." The poetry of that time teems with examples of this debased "poetic diction," the chief requirement being that the language used must be as far as possible removed from truth, from realism, from simplicity, and those other canons of genuine art which offended the literary taste of a formal and artificial age. Take a passage from almost any well-known ballad, and read it through as if it were prose:

O lang, lang may the ladies sit
Wi' their kaims intil their hand,
Before they see Sir Patrick Spens
Come sailing to the land.

There is not one adjective nor "poetic epithet": not a word that was not familiar in the daily speech of those for whom the lay was first sung. And if you analyse most examples of those haunting verses whose appeal is spontaneous and direct—from "Chevy Chace" right down through "Christabel" and the "Ancient Mariner" to certain of Mr. Swinburne's ballads and some of Robert Louis Stevenson's all too scant lyrics—to name but one or two of our modern singers—we shall find, almost without exception, that the verbiage, however poetic, is so, not technically, but naturally. We shall find, that is to say, that the lover of such song, although he must, above all, have the faculties of sympathy and imagination, needs no artificial or acquired sense of the beautiful in poetry. The deft turning of a polished phrase, the linking of a golden chain of mellifluous sound—in short, the academic qualities of verse—appeal to an audience fit though few; but the simpler, and, as we hold, the more enduring stuff of song is for the child as for the sage—for the untutored as for the scholar.

Rough-hewn, if you will, yet from the clean quarry of honest English; not coined in late Latin mints, not from the base metal of post-Renaissance verbiage: the true poetic word is a thing strong, clear, natural, abiding. For as the sense of rhythm gave to the earliest literature of the world the form of song, it is certain that the words must have been such as should appeal to their audience. Song, and the sword; adventure wedded to a marching tune; such, briefly, was the birth of poetic form.

And yet, after all, what a delicate, elusive matter this is, of poetic language! For although we have said that the words of the poet should by no means be exclusively and affectedly set apart for purposes of versifiers, still less should the poet use words exclusively and patently intended for a prose context. Take, for instance, one stanza from Cowper—a stanza to be found, for some inscrutable reason, in most anthologies.

The rose had been washed, just washed in a shower,
Which Mary to Anna conveyed;
The weight of the moisture encumbered the flower
And bowed down its beautiful head.

Here, in the space of four short lines, we have at least six words which may be set down without hesitation as absolutely unpoetic. To begin with, the rose had been "washed." Now a rose, after a shower, does not convey the impression of having been recently subjected to a cleansing process. And yet, again, when Tennyson speaks of the morning-star as "fresh-washed in coolest dew," the expression is the reverse of unpoetic. It is in that special instance appropriate; and its appropriateness makes of it the exception that proves the rule. Then Mary "conveying" the rose to Anna, as if it were a freehold estate or a joint of beef, and the flower, poor thing, "encumbered" with "moisture," like a housewife with her shopping, or an army with its baggage! Probably only exigencies of rhythm and rhyme prevented the poet describing the rose as a "vegetable."

It is a certain deficiency in the wonderful art of discerning what words are suitable or unsuitable for poetry, which has been the cause of the positive disfigurement of many passages, to take a distinguished example, in the poetry of Wordsworth. One could find specimens by the score in many another poet—not names of unbeautiful or unpoetic things, but words which, by their very transplantation into poetic surroundings, become, by some invisible chain of thought, ludicrous. What is it, this magic of words? Perhaps, to a certain extent, the qualities of rhythm and cadence; doubtless, in a large degree, associations and prejudices; and, in a larger degree still, that inexplicable thing we call "charm"—a combination, very likely, of the two causes we have named, and of unconscious forces, deeper still.

C. FOX SMITH:

PLAYWRIGHT OR FANATIC?

The Moral Standpoint of Euripides. By W. H. S. JONES, M.A.
Selwyn College, Cambridge. (Blackie, 2s. 6d.)

MAN, says Mrs. Meynell, is Greek without and Japanese within. His external shape is symmetrical: his internal parts are irregularly disposed. Whether that graceful essayist be correct or not in her distinction between the Greek and the Japanese, it is clear enough that human beauty resides in the outward members, and yet that an adequate adjustment of inward organs, not to say some measure of intelligence, is requisite for a satisfactory human frame. Literature may be said in this to resemble its creator, man. Beauty of form and sublimity of spirit are complementary, and great literature has both.

In some branches of literature it would be hard to find the advocate who would disparage the moral content of the speaker or writer's message. Demosthenes's moral force exalted him above Æschines: Defoe is less than Bunyan. But in poetry, above all in the drama, does genius betray its philosophy of the world, or is it art to conceal all moral purpose? These questions would seem idle, were it not that the most opposing prejudices are to-day endemic amongst us. A recent writer attributed the success at the Court Theatre of Euripides's plays in Mr. Gilbert Murray's translation to a dissatisfaction with the modern drama "proclaimed openly as a discussion on social philosophy and political follies." For this writer Euripides's plays represent "human nature not at any particular period or place, nor as marking a particular form of civilisation or religious development, but in its universal aspect." How is all this reconcilable with Mr. Jones's probing and analysing the same plays to extract the moral and religious views of the writer? It is a curious dilemma. If Euripides attracts to-day, in spite of his intellectual subtilty—because the problems he attacks are antiquated—it is strange that Sophocles, who does not labour under the same infirmity of intruding temporary problems, has not been chosen for honour.

But Mr. Jones sets to work in the most approved modern fashion to dissect his victim. He truly reminds his reader that the generation that lived through the Peloponnesian War and the Plague largely lost their faith in all ideals. He justly insists that Euripides's plays "form an excellent mirror of the prevalent atmosphere [sic], mental, moral, and religious." And then he sets out to discover whether Euripides does not betray his own personal views and feelings. Remembering that the poet "left behind him dramas, not scientific treatises," he states, after Decharme, two rules which he believes will guide him safely through the confused medley of sentiments necessarily discoverable in a dramatist. First, he says, "the occurrence of an idea several times in plays of different dates, especially when it is dwelt upon with evident satisfaction;" and, in the second place, "the expression of a sentiment which does not harmonise with the age or nature of the speaker," are criteria which enable us to recognise the views of the poet himself. It would be interesting to apply these tests to Shakespeare, the more so, since it has been declared that nothing so much marks his absolute supremacy amongst dramatists as the fact that, as it is asserted, he has created a whole world of characters, in which, therefore, no more than in the real world moral laws are invariably manifest, while his fellows' portraiture of the world is controlled and limited by their conception of the world. But, if we confine our speculations to Euripides himself, Decharme's criteria invite criticism. They leave no room for the imperfections and defects of a poet's genius: they open the door wide for the subjectivities of an eccentric interpreter: above all, they exclude a consideration which in the case of Euripides is vital.

What was the poet's own conception of his duty as a poetic artist and as a dramatist? The ordinary Athenian may have held the view that Euripides was an atheist, immoral, irreligious, sceptical, over-subtle, sinking in acute dialectics the dignity of Tragedy: but that view, though taken from the poet's contemporaries, is not necessarily more sound. Aristophanes, it is true, seems to treat this view seriously as legitimate, but there is one sufficient authority for its rejection. Sophocles, who, himself a tragic poet, may be securely reckoned competent to understand his rival, defined, according to a familiar story, with exquisite precision the difference between his own attitude to the drama and that of Euripides. Criticised on the ground that his characters were not true to nature or to the world which his critic knew, he replied, when by way of contrast Euripides was quoted as a dramatist who was true to nature: "I represent characters as they ought to be represented. Euripides represents them as they are." Sophocles idealised, Euripides was realistic. Euripides's characters, indeed, are his contemporaries set in the framework of familiar legends. Those contemporaries with conventional sanctimoniousness were, in many instances, shocked to see themselves and their inconsistencies, their doubts and meannesses, set out upon the stage in flagrant contrast to the fine-sounding heroes they affected to honour and with the traditional respectability looked for in their plays. All the comments made by the ancients upon Euripides's work explain themselves on this supposition: but it must be confessed that it leaves Euripides's private beliefs more than problematical. We can see what his conception of his art was; we cannot draw rigorous conclusions as to his moral philosophy. We can only guess that, had his philosophical views been widely different from those of his sceptical contemporaries, he would hardly have accepted the realistic view of the poet's duty. But it is easy to exaggerate the scepticism of his contemporaries. Aristophanes testifies to the existence of an old-fashioned minority at any rate: and other stories point not necessarily to Euripides's own "enlightenment," but to a belief, held by the dull mob, that such character-drawing as his realistic studies, implied sympathy with their views. More than this cannot be demonstrated. Mr. Jones, following Dr. Verrall, goes a great deal further. He sets Euripides before us as a protestant against the Olympic pantheon and all its legends, a believer in a non-moral Necessity, and yet a believer also in the validity of morality because of its beauty and its harmony with human nature. Euripides, he thinks, inferred two corollaries: (1) "that the cultivated human intelligence is the supreme judge in the moral sphere; (2) that human institutions ought to be regulated by the principle that the human physis, wherever manifested, even in women and slaves, should be honoured and carefully cultivated." If we accept all this as deducible from Euripides's plays (Mr. Jones supplies a very useful index, duly classified, to all the important passages), we shall be wise still to attribute it to Euripides's contemporaries rather than inevitably to himself. Indeed, unless we do so, we seem to involve ourselves in inconsistencies. As Mr. Jones says: "A theory of Euripides's attitude towards various moral problems must be further tested by application to all the obtainable evidence," and again, he says: "the fragments can be used only as confirmation tests bearing out conclusions reached on other grounds." It is remarkable how much of his evidence is, nevertheless, drawn from these detached fragments, and it is noteworthy that no reference is made to the Cyclops. Yet, according to Decharme's rules, since in that play several prayers unnecessary to the play are offered up, in which faith in the existence of the gods is virtually staked on the worshipper's receiving an answer, and the answer is then presently vouchsafed, it would follow that Euripides either believed in the Olympic gods or was not always a reforming iconoclast. The truth is that the prevalence to-day of intellectual tendencies similar to those of Euripides's age has conduced to a one-sided study of his work. His dramatic art is misconceived, except indeed by Mr. Gilbert Murray: even Professor Jebb once wrote disparagingly of the last scene in the Electra, though a poet like Milton found that play, in an especial measure, tragic, as did Aristotle before him. Aristotle insinuates plainly that in all other respects Euripides did not "manage" his plays well, and it is forgetfulness of this that has made modern critics misread them. When old legends, which took shape amid the naïve beliefs of an uncritical generation, were used as the framework of plays whose characters felt, spoke and acted like the men and women of Socrates's Athens, crudenesses and contrasts necessarily appeared. The arbitrary deus ex machina is but one symptom which proclaims the nature of the disease. The faithful study and portrayal of the inter-play between circumstance and character, between different natures and different motives, was, indeed, made interesting by Euripides, but it was beyond his power to incorporate all this originality into the embryonic plot of an earlier age. The result was often an unformed monster, beautiful, it is true, in part, but in part incongruous and inconsistent. Yet it would be unjust to shut our eyes to another side of the question. However much Euripides bungled his plot in other ways, as Aristotle points out, he was master, as no other Greek was, of the art that develops tragic situations. For this his method was admirably adapted. The hero, a man like the theatre-goer of that day, was nevertheless in the inevitable toils of the traditional catastrophe. It is not surprising that the fear and pity of the theatre-goer were purged out of him by the sight, coming home so immediately to him. He saw his puny self in Destiny's grasp and felt the pathos of his misery; and it is this familiar air about Euripides's catastrophes that made and still makes them dominant of men's emotions.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

NEPENTHE *

THE popularity of Mr. Meredith's "Love in the Valley" seems to me to open a door to George Darley's "Nepenthe," a poem thrown on the world seventy years ago as contemptuously perhaps as it was received. During the last ten years it has twice been reprinted, and now stands in the market counterfeiting the bewitchment of some popular poem, at the modest price of one shilling.

Mr. Meredith has nothing, so far as I know, to do with "Nepenthe," nor "Nepenthe" with Mr. Meredith; it is only my ingenuity that relates them. A friend pointed out to me that one of Darley's little lyrics was the probable literary parent of "Love in the Valley"; and as I know that poem to be too firmly established in favour for its admirers to resent the open recognition of one of its conditioning causes, I judged that, their jealousy being impossible, their admiration, or at least their curiosity, might be awakened sufficiently to win for "Nepenthe" the attention which it deserves. Here then is Darley's little lyric:

SERENADE OF A LOYAL MARTYR

Sweet in her green cell the Flower of Beauty slumbers,
Lulled by the faint breezes sighing thro' her hair;
Sleeps she, and hears not the melancholy numbers
Breathed to my sad lute amid the lonely air?

Down from the high cliffs the rivulet is teeming,
To wind round the willow banks that lure him from above:
O that in tears from my rocky prison streaming,
I too could glide to the bower of my love!

Ah! where the woodbines with sleepy arms have wound her,
Opens she her eyelids at the dream of my lay,
Listening like the dove, while the fountains echo round her,
To her lost mate's call in the forests far away?

Come, then, my Bird!—for the peace thou ever bearest,
Still heaven's messenger of comfort to me,
Come!—this fond bosom, my faithfulest, my fairest!
Bleeds with its death-wound, but deeper yet for thee.

I am not posing as advocate for all of Darley's poems; but I would say that a small and wisely made selection of his shorter pieces would have won him a very different reputation from what he now holds; and that he had great originality in learnedly perfecting rare or new forms of metre and rhythm. The piece just cited, "The Palace of Ruin," and the two lyrics "Down the Dardanelles," and "Wind of the West arise" in "Nepenthe" are sufficient proof of this claim.

"Nepenthe," which is my object, is a poem of one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five lines in two cantos, written in the metre of Milton's "Penseroso." The rhythm is treated with such mastery as to obviate monotony, and is also skilfully relieved by the introduction of a variety of other metres, and occasionally by great freedom, properly motivated and harmoniously used. If it is, as I suppose, on a higher plane of excellence than any thing else that Darley wrote, the reason would be that it alone gave him his congenial opportunity. This he recognised himself when he described his faculty as wholly "imaginative" and not "real." "A separatist from society (he wrote) I feel a necessity for intoxication (of spirit) to write with any enthusiasm at all," etc.: and "Nepenthe," as he tells us, was written with "a heat of brain mentally bacchic." The reader indeed may be warned at once that this wholly imaginative poem, being like "Endymion" an allegory, gives also at first the same effect of a superabundant poetry with a minimum of obvious meaning. But while its general purport may elude or even defy comprehension, the verse and diction—if I may sternly except the first lyric, ll. 64-83—are throughout masterly, rich and elevated, and one reads with almost unbroken pleasure, admiration and even wonder: so that the annoyance which the obscurity of its general aim must certainly occasion, is due not to any absence of satisfaction, but to one's natural impatience at being unable to focus or connect the important magnificence. As for the allegory, the closer one examines it the less doubt one has that every word was the approved expression of impassioned intention: but since language thus born will carry more than its contemplated interpretation, one cannot look to define the meaning in every detail. The main clue however, when once given, is so apparent, that when I did discover it I wondered that I had not perceived it at first. I will justify my estimate of the poetry by a few quotations: the first canto begins thus—on a mountain in summer, the sun beautifying the earth:

Over a bloomy land, untrod
By heavier foot than bird or bee
Lays on the grassy-bosomed sod,
I passed one day in reverie.
High on his unpavilioned throne
The heaven's hot tyrant sat alone,
And like the fabled king of old
Was turning all he touched to gold.
The glittering fountains seemed to pour
Steep downward rills of molten ore,
Glassily tinkling smooth between
Broom-shaded banks of golden green.

With golden lip and glistening bell
Burned every bee-cup on the fell,
Whate'er its native unshorn hue,
Snow-white or crimson or cold blue.

The sing'd mosses curling here,
A golden fleece too short to shear.
Crumbled to sparkling dust beneath
My light step on that sunny heath.
Light, for the ardour of the clime
Made rare my spirit, that sublime
Bore me as buoyant as young Time
Over the green Earth's grassy prime,
Ere his slouched wing caught up her slime;
And sprang I not from clay and crime,
Had from those humming beds of thyme
Lifted me near the starry chime
To learn an empyrean rhyme.
No melody beneath the moon
Sweeter than this deep runnel tune!
Here on the greensward grown hot gray,
Crisp as the unshorn desert hay,

I'll lay me, on these mosses brown,
Murmuring beside his murmurs down . . .

After his taste of the incense of the phoenix-tree he has a vision of Revelry:

Light-trooping o'er the distant lea
A band I saw, where Revelry Seemed on her bacchant foot to be,
And heard the dry tambour afar
Before her Corybantian car
Booming the rout to winy war.

Again the same subject, l. 460:

With pipe and ceaseless cittern thrum
Tinkling tabor's shallow drum,
Cymbal and lengthening corn-muse hum.
Uproar sweet! as when he crost,
Omnipotent Bacchus, with his host,

* Selections from the poems of George Darley, with introduction and notes by R. A. Streatfeild. Methuen, 1894.

To farthest Ind; and for his van
Satyrs and other sons of Pan,
With swollen eye-burying cheeks of tan,
Who trolled him round which way he ran
His spotted yoke through Hindustan. . . .

Here is the lark;

. . . Ravish me swifter than Earth's roll
Towards bright day's Eoan goal;
Or if West I choose to run,
Would sweep me thither before the sun,
Raising me on ethereal wing
Lighter than the lark can spring
When drunk with dewlight which the Morn
Pours from her translucent horn
To steep his sweet throat in the corn.

Here is a song worthy of our navy; and with it I am sorry not to give the picture of Gibraltar (ii. 188):

Down the Dardanelles!
Behold the Thunderer where she rides!
Behold her how she swells
Like floating clouds her canvas sides!
Raising with ponderous breast the tides
On both the shores as down she glides,
Down the Dardanelles!

Down the Dardanelles!
Each continent like a caiff stands,
As every broadside knells!
While with a voice that shakes the strands
She spreads her hundred-mouthed commands,
Albion's loud law to both the lands,—
Down the Dardanelles!

Down the Dardanelles!
Ye billowy hills before her bown!
Wind caverns! your deep shells.
Ring Ocean and Earth her old renown,
Long as that sun from Ida's crown
Smooths her broad road with splendour down,
Down the Dardanelles.

In the above "bown" is poetic for bows. "Glides" is an almost certain conjecture of my own in place of what must be a misprint or similar kind of error. The poem is, I think, a prophetic warning to England, lest in her pursuit of sun-joys she too should fall like Icarus. I give finally as much as there is room for of the rich exordium of Canto II.:

Antiquity, thou Titan-born!
That rear'st thee, in stupendous scorn
At all succession from thy bed
On prime Earth's firm foundations spread.
And look'st with dim but settled eye
O'er thy deep lap, within whose span
Layer upon layer sepulchred lie
Whole generations of frail man!
That steady glare not fierce simoom,
Blasting with his hot pinion blinds,
Nor floods of dust thy corse entomb.
Heaped on thee by the sexton winds!
Nor temple, tower, nor ponderous town
Built on thy grave can keep thee down,
But still thou rear'st thee in thy scorn,
Antiquity, thou Titan-born,
To crush our souls with that dim frown!
Strong son of Chaos! who didst seem
Only a fairer form of him,
Moulding his mountainous profounds
To fanes and monumental grounds;
His rocky coigns, with giant ease,
In pyramids and palaces
Piling aslope, as we with pain
His ruinous rubbish raised in vain. . . .

A poem of the quality which these fragments exhibit, and they are inadequate to represent Darley's inexhaustible variety, only needs that attention should be called to it. If the passages which I have chosen are among the best, very much of the rest is as good, and never further below itself than the best poems of such length are. For those who will at my recommendation read the allegory I will give such an outline of the meaning as may enable them to read with better intelligence than I could until I had seriously trifled with my patience, or rather, to tell the truth, it was the bodily inactivity and low grade of occupation to which an attack of influenza had reduced me that reconciled me to the pastime of deciphering so desperate a riddle.

Darley's own account of "Nepenthe" is as follows: "The general object or mythos of the poem is to show the folly of discontent with the natural tone of human life. Canto I. attempts to paint the ill-effects of over-joy; Canto II. those of excessive melancholy; part of the latter object remains to be worked out in Canto III., which should likewise show that contentment with the mingled cup of humanity is the true Nepenthe." We have only to do with the existing Cantos I. and II. In the first the Phoenix is the symbol of "melancholy gladness"; and in the second the less important unicorn is the symbol of "majestic sadness." Ambition is the term used throughout to denote the motive of dissatisfaction which makes man seek a nepenthe.

The first Canto is the picture of excessive joy in the more animal sphere, that is, the ecstasy of life, joys born of the sun: and the passage of experience is from the hot sun-joys to death in the cold ocean.

The second Canto is the picture of ideal pleasures, that is the ecstasy of mental life, joys born of the Moon, and leading to the desert where the unicorn lives in majestic sadness; and the passage is from the moon-joys to the dry desert.

The details are as subtle as they are perplexing, and the poem must be known before any example would be readable. But it may be of help to indicate that the hero's dissatisfaction with unmixed sun-joys is first betrayed in his sympathy with the lowlands, witnessed by his description of them (i. 570, etc.), and becomes critical on Mount Ida, when he begins to thirst for the cold and clouded mountains, "welcome gray Europe," etc. (765): after which his Maenad companions recognise him to be a traitor, and treat him as they once did Orpheus; and he shares the fate of Icarus. The transition from sun-joys to idealism is well invited by the contemplation of antiquity in the magnificent introduction, of over two hundred lines, to the second Canto.

I should have been grateful for these hints when I first read "Nepenthe." I am not fond of allegories, and I do not know that I have admired the poem more since I came nearer to its interpretation. Reading now without much attention to a meaning which I readily recognise, I cannot remember what I thought the things meant before I understood them; yet it is a satisfaction to know that the meaning is really there, and the clue does often very much enhance the value of the expression. In a good work of art, allegorical or not, the main effect appeals sufficiently to the senses at once, while every detail is good in itself; and from the first I always found plenty of this best kind of pleasure in reading "Nepenthe." While thanking Mr. Streatfeild one cannot but envy him his good fortune in finding so fine a poem to rescue from obscurity.

FICTION

A Sealed Book. By ALICE LIVINGSTONE. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

USUALLY, in modern, sensational literature, books are not sealed unless they contain something of a particularly startling nature, and we approach this one, prepared to revel in hair-breadth escapes, dark plots and thwarted villainy. We are not disappointed. The story positively bristles with incident; the usual breathless panorama is unrolled before our eyes; attempted murders and secret marriages play their accustomed parts, and the blameless and beautiful girl heroine, after a career along the path of tribulation, passes from being the burning light of a charity bazaar into a lunatic asylum and thence into the arms of a handsome lover who, backed by a Russian prince and three stalwart policemen, is waiting to receive her. That the Russian potentate's wife, mislaid by him some twenty years before, should also be an inmate of the asylum is only in keeping with the rest of the book. In spite of the ravages which time and solitary confinement have wrought upon her, he joyfully renounces his rôle of disconsolate widower and takes her to his heart, not even stopping to inquire whether she is mad or sane. The usual villain, dark and sinewy, with fierce and "tigerish" eyes, is in league with the usual grim housekeeper; together, they lurk behind curtains and peer through key-holes; together, they are invariably frustrated by the gallant hero who, needless to say, turns out to be the long-lost son of the Russian potentate. That he should also be the nephew of the grim housekeeper is more astonishing, but even a sensational novel has its surprises. It only remains for a suitable ancestry to be found for the heroine, Grace Aylmer, who is, accordingly, ingeniously provided for by the opportune discovery that she is the grand-daughter of a retired Prime Minister. With the aid of a swift electric brougham and convenient attacks of severe nervous headache, the mother of Grace Aylmer has for years been leading a complicated dual existence, part of her life being spent in a country vicarage, as wife of the vicar, part in London as the beautiful, unmarried daughter of Sir Campbell Montault. The death of the villain, who drinks the poisoned wine he has prepared for the Prime Minister, puts an end to this harassing existence, and is the signal for a general reconciliation.

The Field of Glory. By HENRY SIENKIEWICZ. (Lane, 6s.)

ALL through this novel we were expecting Turks. In his preface the publisher takes for granted quite justifiably that most of us "are not likely to be versed in Polish history." So he gives us a short account of John Sobieski (Ian Sobiesky), King of Poland and "Saviour of Vienna during the formidable Turkish invasion of Europe in 1682-1683. The first sentence of the novel describes the severity of the winter of 1682-1683 and rings up the curtain on a little company of travellers trying to make their way across a snowy plain. When they were stopped by a mysterious noise we listened for Turks, and when "the dark forms of a party of horsemen" dispersed the boars and wolves who had made the noise, we thought the horsemen would be Turks. But they were gentlemen of the neighbourhood and after they had collected another gentleman, the hero in fact, who had been driven by wolves up a tree, the whole party resorts to a country house near. The chief characters of the novel are now assembled. There is the elderly Armenian host and the elderly traveller with his penniless but well-born ward Panna Seninsky whom he desires to marry; and there are six young men who before supper is over also desire to marry the ward. Five of them are so jealous of the hero (he who was up a tree) that they challenge him and he worsts them in single combat, one after the other. This leads to misunderstandings with the heroine. Instead of admiring the hero for his prowess the unreasonable girl is offended when her five rescuers return, all wounded, in a cart. So she agrees to marry her guardian, and there is a curious description of a betrothal feast in a Polish castle, where "even under the table crouched several servants with bottles of wine, so that when a guest wearied with drinking put a glass on the ground between his legs it might be filled at once." According to the admirable fine old Polish custom, covers have been laid at the table for unexpected guests, and when the dogs howl and the lights go out death enters unexpectedly. The story then concerns itself with the courtship of Panna Seninsky by Martsian Krepetsky, who beats her black-and-blue because she refuses him, and with the punishment meted out to him by four genial ruffians who are brothers, who love the heroine, and who tar-and-feather Martsian in order to show her that there are feeling hearts in the world, and that she has protectors. When she is escaping from the neighbourhood with her protectors, and the cavalcade is stopped by a trench across the road and by queer-looking figures, almost quadrangular, not at all like human beings, we said, "Turks at last," though we did not understand why they should be "almost quadrangular." However, it was only Martsian again and a few of his friends. The story ends with marriage bells, but not with the return of the hero from war. The curtain drops just as he sets out to fight the Turks, and we can only hope that he will have the good luck to meet them.

Phantasma. By A. C. INCHBOLD. (Blackwood, 6s.)

MR. INCHBOLD has been almost unfortunately appropriate in the title of his story of Napoleon in Egypt and Syria. The scenes are incoherent and crowded as dreams, and the action shifts restlessly from chapter to chapter. The effort to be impartial has resulted in a stultifying of interest, so that whether we are reading of the French or the natives, we are left indifferent. Several times we start upon a romance, but it comes to nothing. Impartiality is the duty of the historian; in the novelist it is scarcely even a virtue. It blurs the outlines, and makes the characters monotonous, unless they are touched by a master-hand. Mr. Inchbold seems to think that he is bound to startle us at the beginning of every chapter. He takes us into the thick of an adventure, whose causes and personages are not very clear, and then quite suddenly pulls up, and starts afresh with: "In the desert a Bedawin lay sleeping," or some other such twist of the kaleidoscope. This happens over and over again. He also has a trick of describing his personages several times; when we read that "a man crossed the court," followed by full details as to his appearance, it probably turns out that he has already been introduced to us, and the withholding of his name till the end of a long paragraph, sometimes till the end of a chapter, becomes a useless piece of mystification. The style of the book adds to one's irritation; polysyllables and complicated turns of language riot all over it. It is difficult to have patience with such a phrase as: "Consumed with disquietude lest a distance sufficing unto escape would fail to be compassed ere the enemy had struck upon their trail. Ferahnak . . ." The book abounds with sentences which turn one's thoughts almost affectionately to the curt English of Ollendorff. It lacks coherence, clearness, and purpose, and reads like the piecing together of a long night of dreams. The title, however, is not a piece of trenchant self-criticism, but refers to the visionary nature of Napoleon's dreams of conquering the East. He appears in the book, and so do other historical personages; but they are all—phantasms.

Joseph Vance. By WILLIAM DE MORGAN. (Heinemann, 6s.)

WE wish that Mr. de Morgan had been content with a manner of construction as simple and direct as the actual writing of his book. But he has cumbered himself with devices to make his story emphatically real, and by doing so has defeated his own end, and roused suspicion, which he heed never have tried to allay. Joseph Vance writes the story of his life, an old man alone in a Bloomsbury lodging-house. That device is a good and legitimate one, and none the less good for being old, though Mr. de Morgan is inclined to strike too insistently the pathetic note of "Ah death in life, the days that are no more." The old man's digressions impede the story and become tiresome rather than moving. But he was obliged to keep the old man well in the foreground, in order to lend point to further and meaningless tricks; for the manuscript is found by Mr. F— of Kensington, and submitted to the publishers; and, as if that were not enough, a note is added by the publishers containing a supposed letter, which establishes the identity of one of the characters of the story. The artifice is clumsy, and quite unworthy of Mr. de Morgan. For his book is otherwise a capital piece of writing. Jo Vance and Jo Vance's father are excellently done. The old father, who wins his way by clever bluff to prosperity, is a character full of life and real humour; and if Jo Vance's love-affairs and later life are not quite so interesting and amusing as his early days of ragamuffinhood (Lossie is a little overdone), yet the book for all its length is never tedious, and we were continually delighted by the apt wit of the writing.

The Nymph. By F. DICKBERRY. (White, 6s.)

MR. DICKBERRY has a mania for unmasking the depravities of social life, and in "The Storm of London" the denudation was so complete as to be startling. He now turns his attention to the other side of the Channel, giving us a picture of French country-house life that must be anything but reassuring to Mrs. Grundy, or to that lady's Gallic representative. If all that we have heard lately of our own social condition is true, we feel that, at any rate as far as smart society is concerned, the entente cordiale cannot be far off! The inmates of the Château Crespy-sur-Roc are brainless, heartless and hopelessly bored, their lives a long round of vulgar intrigue. Those who are not sinners are sanctimonious prigs, and the narrow-minded propriety of the village worthies of Crespy-le-Bourg is as annoying as the impropriety of their more aristocratic neighbours. Mr. Dickberry looks at them all with the jaundiced eye of the social reformer. The finest figure in this hysterical house-party is the old marquise, a relic of a bygone and more noble age; though the efforts of her grandchildren to conceal their many intrigues from her hawk-like eye only add to the unpalatableness of the picture. Lucienne Darlot, the virtuous wife of a poor artist stands out, as she is meant to do, from this unpleasing crowd. She ventures into their midst, only to find herself the victim of a pointless and spiteful plot, which ends in the untimely death of her husband in a duel. Her passionate love for him, and her readiness to hold out the hand of friendship to the man who is practically his murderer, is somewhat unconvincing, but she is called the "Nymph" on account of her disregard for all accepted codes and principles, and is perhaps hardly to be judged by ordinary standards. "You are the symbol of nature. You are free as you are harmonious; as strong as you are graceful. Your nature has its roots deeply attached to the earth, and your soul soars far above the clouds, unfettered by traditions." Thus Roland de Laya describes the complex personality of the woman he loves. Her firm refusal to bow to the tyranny of the family that has wronged her, show her to be at least human.

FINE ART

THE ART REVIVAL IN IRELAND

THERE are, in Ireland, but two attitudes towards art—that of the pessimist who says that art can have no future in a country so steeped in poverty and so isolated as this little western island; and that of the optimist, who, with magnificent faith and boundless enthusiasm, declares that Ireland is to be the chosen home of the arts in the future—that out of her isolation and her poverty will come the quickening spirit that is to light the torch of a new artistic impulse for western Europe. Between these two extremes there is, of course, the crowd that cares nothing for art; the pleasure-loving, indifferent crowd, composed in Ireland of all ranks and of both sexes, that prefers a race-meeting or a polo-match to the best picture that was ever painted. But there are a good many people who do care, and these are almost always to be found in one or other of the two camps. It is never interesting to examine a negative theory, so we may leave the pessimists to themselves for the moment.

After all, if the many "movements" now seething in Ireland come to nothing, the pessimists will always have the satisfaction of saying to the optimists: "I told you so," and will not feel any worse off than they did before.

It may be necessary here to explain that a "movement" is, in Ireland, the key-note of every situation. It is a word the meaning of which it would be hard, perhaps, to define, but it is the word most frequently used in Ireland with reference to every conceivable sphere of activity. Nothing ever happens here without a movement. Things do not evolve as they do in other countries; there does not seem to be that silent under-world of growth and development of which we feel the existence elsewhere. It is an essential of our national temperament that before we can accomplish anything we must have an outward and visible sign of the inward and spiritual energy which inspires us.

Of the many movements more or less closely connected with the arts which have risen above the horizon in Ireland during the last decade I am now only concerned with one, and that the most recent—the movement for the revival and uplifting of the arts of painting and sculpture. Let us glance for a moment at the work of a few of the younger Irish artists. We had a very good opportunity of studying it at the Exhibition of the Royal Hibernian Academy in the spring; for, to their credit be it spoken, the Council of the Academy this year exercised a most generous hospitality. The walls were dominated by a spirit of youth: it overcame the academic atmosphere, usually so insistent and so oppressive; it flaunted its gay defiance and confident strength in interesting experiments which showed the influence of every school and of none. As we looked, we could not but feel hopeful as to the future. These young Irish artists are engaged upon an adventure of which they do not yet see the end or the aim. They are still without definite ideas or art principles. They have not the solidarity of the Glasgow school; in many cases, even, they know very little about the rules of good draughtsmanship or the elementary technique of their craft, for those who have stayed at home have had no one to teach them these things. But they have inspiration, a feeling for the beauty of the world, and a certain independence of vision—qualities which promise well for Irish art in the future. In saying this I wish to guard against exaggeration. I am fully alive to the fact that we have suffered almost as much in Ireland from over-confidence as from the lack of it. The two attitudes I have indicated at the beginning of this article are, indeed, typical of our manner of regarding ourselves and our achievements. If we do not despair altogether we are rather given to fly to the other extreme and develop such a good conceit of ourselves that we can see no spots on the sun of our glory. But, without going so far as to see a twentieth-century Hals or a budding Chardin in every Irish painter, one must admit that good work and interesting work is being done in Ireland, and done in many cases in the face of very distinct obstacles.

With regard to a painter like Mr. William Orpen, whose work is as well known in London as it is here, it is unnecessary to say much. He is already recognised as one of the most able and original of the younger men. If his portraits now and then show a tendency to over-emphasis, they are masterly studies of character; and sometimes, as in the portrait of Mr. Uniacke Townshend, in the Royal Dublin Society, Mr. Orpen reaches a very high level. In such pictures as this, and the charming Interior, Waiting for their Cue, which has just been bought by Lord Iveagh, we lose sight of the amazing cleverness, the dashing technique, and are conscious only of the sheer genius of this young painter.

Mr. Dermot O'Brien, who, like Mr. Orpen, is an Associate of the R.H.A., I prefer, for the moment, to consider as a landscape painter. At the recent exhibition he showed a picture of a turnip-field, which he calls The End of the Drought. The bright green field, so true in tone, is rendered with a quiet fidelity and a sure touch. There is no straining after effect and no avoidance of difficulty. The field glistens and scintillates with the glow that follows the bath of heavy rain that has fallen the night before, while above is a glorious Irish sky, full of light and life and moving shadow shapes, with enough blue in it to make the traditional Virgin's cloak. There is a buoyancy about the composition, a simple directness of treatment, and over all the charm of an absolute sincerity. When Mr. O'Brien turns to landscape, the latent poetry in his disposition seems to become freed, and finds expression in his work; in his portraits he is too often dry, and literal, and matter-of-fact. He seems to lack the sympathetic insight without which it is impossible to make men and women live on canvas.

To mention Irish landscape painters is to suggest Mr. Nathaniel Hone, who, though no longer a young man, is the first of Irish painters in this genre. There is something elemental about Mr. Hone's work—something that connects it with Nature in a very intimate and unusual way. His attitude is very far from being that of the spectator, concerned with his own emotions, or with the composition of his picture. Mr. Hone seems to have himself become a part of what he paints. His personality has fallen from him and become merged into these seas and lonely fields and spreading trees, under which the cattle lie lazily in the summer sunshine. The impression is sincere and true, but it lacks the individual touch we get in much modern work. Mr. Hone has no confessions to make about himself as he transfers his vision to canvas. He is the interpreter—a large-minded, simple-natured man, who has lived much with Nature and become permeated with the spirit of her inevitableness.

Another landscape painter, whose work has as yet been little seen out of Ireland, is Mr. George Russell (A. E.), who is known also as a poet and one of the most enthusiastic workers in the Irish literary movement. Mr. Russell's imagination plays a large part in his painting, though his pictures are the farthest in the world from being "literary." To Mr. Russell, Nature is a personality—a divine woman for ever manifesting herself anew to those who have eyes to behold her beauty, and he is at once her lover and her high priest. Sometimes, on his canvases, mystic shapes move among the shadows by the sea shore, where happy children play and "fall on dream"; sometimes the hills lie lonely under the bending sky, their lines mingling with those of the sky into an exquisite harmony; sometimes grave peasants bend over their work, seeming, in their rhythmic movements, to have become part of the landscape in which they move. But always in these pictures there is charm—the charm of an elusive beauty as rare as it is fascinating.

I find I have left myself no space in which to speak of a number of other painters, whose work, equally with those I have mentioned, is a justification for the title of this article: nor of the chief outcome of the movement—the establishment of a modern art gallery in the Irish capital. This gallery, which owes its existence to the enthusiasm of Mr. Hugh Lane, only awaits a suitable building to be an accomplished fact. It will not be an institution for the glorification of the obvious, as many of our provincial museums unfortunately are, but a gallery where Corot, and Whistler, and Manet will hold sway, and where the Irish art student may familiarise himself with the work of the best painters of modern times.

MUSIC

WORDS AND SONGS

POETRY and music have been united almost as long as each has been a consciously developed art, and yet we still seem very far from knowing certainly what qualities in a poem make it suitable for singing or even possible to be set well to music as a solo song. It is curious how little attention the classical composers gave to the question. Handel, ploughing through several chapters of the Bible to make an oratorio, would assign any passage to the solo voice, where his sense of musical contrast demanded a cessation of the chorus. Bach, indeed, with his intimate personal outlook upon the subjects on which he wrote, was an exception, but Haydn and Mozart were sufficiently influenced by Italian opera not to trouble themselves very much about the problem, so that Beethoven's fastidiousness as to what he would and what he would not set, was almost a new element in a composer's character. Perhaps the general appreciation of the importance of the question was retarded by the fact that the man who first showed the great possibilities of solo song had such an overpowering genius that he could make songs out of the most unpromising forms. If one begins to dogmatise about what will make a song and what will not, it is very easy for an antagonist to turn up a crushing example in a volume of Schubert. And yet we may be too ready to take it for granted that all Schubert's songs are good songs because they are set to fine music. There are among them examples where the music falls to a second-rate level because the words are second-rate, or where the words can only be said to have suggested the music without inspiring it. Few as the cases, may be, they are yet sufficient to prove that there are some poems which simply will not make songs however great the musical art expended upon them.

When we come to consider Modern English songs we are plunged into fearful depths of inappropriateness, because the greater part of English poetry, much of the best English poetry, is essentially of the kind which does not make songs. I leave on one side the inanities of the notorious drawing-room ballad. We all know the range of that, from the fervently foolish love-song to the complete tragedy enacted in three verses. But among better types of songs, words chosen and set by real musicians from among the works of real poets, there is still a large quantity of failure from sheer incompatibility between the two elements, words and music. If we try to define the qualities which make words good for songs we shall probably first think of such things as brevity, compactness, or singleness of idea, and a pointed manner of expression; but if the last may be considered an essential, both Schubert and Brahms have shown that even if ninety-nine out of a hundred songs possess the first two of these qualities, the hundredth, which has them not, may yet be a great song. But the one thing which is a necessity is incompleteness. The words must not tell the whole of the story if music is to be added to them. That is why the best German lyrics as well as those of Shakespeare, Herrick and Burns bear setting, nay often demand music. They all alike leave an indefinable sense of suggestion rather than of expression. The German songs, with their simple, oft-repeated imagery of nightingales and moonlight; Shakespeare with whom, at any rate to modern ears, the sense seems almost sacrificed to lilt and rhythm; the slender ideas of Herrick, daintily expressed; Burns's tender emotions half hidden, half revealed by his native scenery, all leave much to be filled up by the imagination of the reader, or by the art of the musician. But with much typically English poetry the opposite is the case. Tennyson prided himself on the "musicalness" of his verse, and at its best it is so musical that it requires no other music. He describes everything, and takes pains to make his picture complete, and when he does this with the right touches the result is delightful, but it needs no more. When he does it with the wrong touches—well of that nothing need be said. For this reason the "Maud" songs have been a stumbling-block to many a musician, and we have lately heard a great deal of them at London concerts, and whenever heard they leave a sense of overloading and futile effort. Perhaps the most obvious instance is found in the lines:

Maud is not seventeen
But she is tall and stately.

Whether these lines are in themselves poetry I need not discuss. The poet thought them necessary to complete his description, but these and other lines like them, are given an importance by being set to music which makes them seem unbearably commonplace, and this is inevitably the case where a poet habitually enters into small details of description.

There is another type of words for music which goes rather to the opposite extreme, the type which supplies many modern song-writers whose works are often commended, I mean lyrics written especially for music. Their authors have for the most part grasped the art of leaving out. There is the suggested idea, generally rather a small one, but still one quite capable of musical treatment, and it is expressed in a way that can be sung. Those who frequent London song recitals will recognise the kind without definite instances. Their failure lies in the fact that the author relies on the music for individuality and life, and so his lines are not poetry but merely verse. In all cases the words must have their own individuality as the music must, and of course if the song is to be a work of art, its words must have that indefinable magic which makes poetry.

I need not apologise for making these suggestions under the heading of Music, for it is a musician's subject. After all it is the musicians not the poets who are the ultimate judges of what words will make songs, which perhaps partly accounts for the number of songs with bad words. Though I have spoken only of songs in the sense of solo songs of concert type, the question is one which really affects to some extent every kind of vocal composition, though the more limited the musical form, the more limited the amount of poetry which can be used for it, and hence the greater possibility of mistake. Besides, in the case of a simple song the poise is so delicate, that it requires a finely balanced nature to discern the distinctions between art and artifice, the true and the false. The immensely widened resources of our musical art have made it possible to set adequately to music many things which a century ago might have seemed impossible, but technical advance has in no way settled the question by making all things possible. On the contrary it makes more sharp the dividing line between good and evil.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. LONGMANS AND CO. have nearly ready, in two volumes, the "Letters, Personal and Literary, of Robert Earl of Lytton (Owen Meredith)." Lady Betty Balfour is editing this memorial of her father, who had as his friends, and had correspondence with, many notable men in the world of affairs and among the foremost representatives of art and literature throughout the four decades (1850-90) of last century. It was in 1855, it may be recalled, that "Clytemnestra," which, like nearly all the Earl of Lytton's books, was published under the pseudonym "Owen Meredith," appeared, and Miss Betham Edwards, it will be remembered, edited a selection of his verse.

The memoir which Mr. R. L. Nettleship included in the third volume of the collected essays of Thomas Hill Green which he edited, and which was published in 1888, is to be reissued in a revised and separate form presently. Thomas Hill Green was occupant from 1877 till his death in 1882 of the chair of Moral Philosophy at Oxford; he was a trenchant critic of Herbert Spencer; and he exercised a potent influence on many of his contemporaries. A personal friend of Mrs. Humphry Ward, Green is represented as "Mr. Gray" in Robert Elsmere. To the new memoir Mrs. T. H. Green will contribute a brief introduction.

A volume on "The Poets and Poetry of Lincolnshire" will be added very soon to the considerable number of interesting antiquarian, topographic, and locally historic volumes we owe to the industrious pen of Mr. William Andrews, librarian of the Royal Institution, Hull. Alfred Tennyson's is, of course, the most illustrious name associated with Lincolnshire, and he and his brothers, John and Charles Wesley, Thomas Miller, Thomas Cooper, Jean Ingelow, and January Searle will be included in the biographical notices in the book, which will also contain appropriate examples of their work.

Professor Knight's memorial volume of Thomas Davidson, the "Wandering Scholar," is to be published in the United States by Messrs. Ginn of Boston, and in this country by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin.

Messrs. Jack have two interesting colour books in preparation for issue in the autumn. These are "The Enchanted Land," a fairy book with pictures by Miss Katherine Cameron, and "The Golden Staircase," a child's anthology pictured by Mrs. Spooner. Both these have been edited by Louey Chisholm, author of "In Fairyland," which has been such a favourite with children and art-lovers alike.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE ANTIQUARY AND THE SEAL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Under the special circumstances connected with the publishing of Mr. Harvey Bloom's work on Seals, which forms one of the series of "Antiquary's Books," I feel sure that you will allow me (as General Editor) to make a brief rejoinder to my friend Mr. Barron's review in your last issue.

I do not agree with several of his strictures, and think, in common with other critics, that the book well fills a vacant niche in popular archæology—but I desire to take my share in a variety of slips in the reading of the inscriptions. With one or two exceptions these misreadings are quite obviously due to printer's errors in dealing with somewhat poorly written "copy" of an unusual character. Proof reading in such a case requires great care. It so happened that Mr. Bloom was ill in bed when his work went through the press, and the responsibility of "reading" fell chiefly on myself. Very soon after the book was out, my attention was directed to several wrong readings of the seal legends, and I was ashamed to think that I had let them pass. I can plead but little in mitigation of carelessness, save that in the pressure of other work I passed over the inscriptions too rapidly, well knowing that Mr. Bloom was an experienced scholar.

About five weeks ago, I wrote to Mr. Bloom forwarding a suggested errata list of inscriptions with my apologies. In reply, I learnt, to my sorrow, that Mr. Bloom was too ill to be allowed to see his letters. Under these circumstances, it was arranged with the publishers that such a list should be printed and inserted in all the unissued copies, and that I believe has been done. I have not a copy by me, but I am confident that each of the misreadings of the seal legends mentioned in the ACADEMY review are therein corrected. I should like to repeat that the large majority of such errata are clearly overlooked printer's slips, being of a nature that Mr. Bloom was as incapable as Mr. Barron of deliberately making.

May I add that neither Mr. Bloom nor Messrs. Methuen have any knowledge of this letter, which I am sending you entirely on my own responsibility, on the culpa mea principle.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Having been an advocate of simplified and fonetic spelling for many years, I naturally sympathize with the efforts of the American Spelling Board and their colleagues here, tho by issuing "lists" of words, somewhat arbitrarily selected, to be riten by their disipls in the new method, I do not think they ar going quite the best way to werk.

In my forthcoming book, in which I hav treated the hole matter exhaustivly, my aim has been to sistematize the subject as far as possibl, and with this vew hav divided the reform into six stages, thre of simplified, and thre of fonetic spelling, any wun of which may be consistently followed by upholders of the caus, each according to his curage or enthusiasim. The first stage, which even the most timid need hardly fear to adopt, is to adhere uniformly to simplified spellings which ar already establisht in som part or other of the English-speaking world, or by the usage of competent riters and filologists. Such ar: (1) The substitution of simple "e" for "æ" and "œ," as in medieval, esthetic, con, maneuver, cenozoic. (2) The abolition of the useless "u" in color, parlor, arbor, etc. (3) The replacing of "re" by "er" in center, meter, meager, aker, massaker, sepulcher. (4) The adoption of shorter participial forms—more common at the beginning of the last century than now—like spelt, dreamt, lost, mixt, plucht. (5) The adoption and extension of simpler spellings for kemical terms, such as saccharin, margarin, toxin, oxid, phosphat, sulfit. (6) The omission of final "ue" in short syllables, as catalog, pedagog. (7) The use of shorter forms in words like toilet, quartet, cigaret, flanenet, program, decigram, preterit, plebiscit, ballad, develop, secretariat, decad, egoism, traveler, worshipping, richely. (8) The use of English forms, as far as possibl, for naturalized foran werds like detour, cortège, naivety, clientele, fiancée, habituée, renaissance, debris, seance, espionage, accouchment, and the substitution by good native expressions of refractory terms like dépot (freit-shed), mêlée (scrimmage, scuff), guerrilla (skirmish), which ar usually unpronounceable or misspelt. (9) The substitution of "z" for "s," as far as possibl, in all endings like baptize, civilize, advertize, (surprise), also in other werds where the former is sometimes uzed, as tease, boose, cozy. (10) The use of "i" for "y" wherever the latter is not etimologically justified, as in tire, tiro, lich, sirup, cider, etc. (11) The use of "f" for "ph" where sanctiond by common or correct custom, as fantasm, sulfur, frenzy. (12) The emploiment of any simplified forms already current, such as ax, wo, mold, plow, gag, urot, gild, rime, skilful, recal, duiness, woful, bark, souvan, check, oker, coconut, licorice, stedfast, lentil, fagot, wagon, matins, tobaccos, quire, fusileer, peddler, mama, sismic, acustic.

The second stage is to ad to these such simplifications as may, with perfect conformity to analogy or etimology, be reasonably adopted, as stedy, harhen, parlament, broch, sholder, salin, hostil, cargos, coud, financier, fesant, triumf, fotograf, det, sent, gard, gess, cotter, visiter, docter, registrar, colporter, amaler, opposit, yeah.

The third stage is to abolish all superfluous letters whatever, and reduce peculiar spellings to order (the stile in which I am now riting) as in hed, hav, nurish, asemble, laf, cof, tho, thru, siht, naut, fild, aant, seex, neether, moov, lill, pcpl, uze, houz, las, mes, shoud, tipe, tung, rong, leag, harang, mosh, trafikine.

The first stage of fonetic spelling, as distinguishingt from simplified, is to represent each vowel sound by one letter or the most appropriate digraf, as (say) haaf, taek, spiek, poan, hoem, spoun, heit, owt, seut, and to uze the consonants, g, j, h, s, t, y, z, sh, zh, ch, ng, exclusively for their own particular values, as in gig, fuf, kik, wisht, priti, bizi, fashon, rouzh, fach, ingh, abolishing c, q and x as superfluos.

The second is to introduce a skedule more in conformity with standard Latin or Continental vowel values, as in the English werds mama, demesne, intrigue, forlorn, propose, Zulu, aïle [Faust, piu], thus kdf, ték, spth, hôm, spân, pôn, pân, fêrn, ail, hau, fin, acute accents to bi uzed, when necessary, for marking the stres on short vowels, as contrâct, contênt. This is the method authorized, and becoming gradually more familiar, for the transliteration of Oriental names, as Kumasi (Coomassee), Khartum, Satlaj (Sutledge), Jabalpâr (Jubbulpore), Matabele (Mahtahbaylay), Jagannâth (Juggernaut), Panjâb (Punjaub), Maui (Mowee), Jaipâr (Jyepoor), sati (suttee), thagi (thuggee), hauri (cowrie), etc. A stil further improovment would be the substitution of c, j, tc, dj, g, and x for sh, zh, ch, ng, and kh (guttural), thus permitting all the English sounds to be represented, logically and scientifiically, with types which every printer possesses: th and dh, for the sounds in thigh and thy, being the only exeptions, tho, as the separate sounds of their constituents only ocur in distinct syllables, where they can be indicated by a hifen, as cort-hand, mad-haus, no confusion would be thus causd.

The final stage, of which perhaps the best practical exampl is to be found in the vowel scale of the Standard Dictionary, and the most complete in the International Alphabet of the "Asociasiô Fonetik" of Bourg-la-Reine, is to introduce new types for all fones not provided for by the ordinary caracters—about ten woud be required in English—the only sistem which satisfies all scientific requirements.

My werk wil also deal with mispronunciations, both of English and foran werds, many of which hav resulted from our ludicros and perplexing "orthografy," but this is another subject, upon which, should you be willing to grant the space, I shoud like to enlarge on som future ocasion.

EVACUSTES A. PHIPSON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If the reform in English spelling spoken of by Professor Skeat, and Mr. Mayhew, were generally adopted,—would it not mean the complete ruin of English literature? for, in this way, would not the great interest in the derivation of the word be, in the end, completely lost?

F. MAYHEW.

ROBERT BARCLAY

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—There is a later edition of "The Apology" than that Mr. Jaffray mentions.

Curiosity induced me to purchase a copy at a second-hand book-stall. This is the thirteenth edition published and printed by William Irwin, 24 Deansgate, Manchester. The original edition is in Latin. The first English edition 1678. In a notice to the reader of the thirteenth edition it is stated that the text has undergone careful revision and comparison with many former issues by several friends interested in producing a genuine copy of this celebrated work.

Robert Barclay seems to have shown the wisdom of the serpent in his address to Charles II. and the harmlessness of the dove in his encounter with the highwayman.

SHIRLEY BROOKS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Having been commissioned to write the Life of Shirley Brooks, will you allow me to ask through your columns for letters, reminiscences, and any other information which may help to make the book as complete as possible? I need hardly say that the greatest care will be taken of any documents or pictures placed at my disposal.

THE FUTURE LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Whether the Anthologies, Pagan and Christian, can be taken as authorities for Pagan and Christian sentiment in the contemplation and presence of the solemn fact of death, is open, I think, to serious doubt. I believe that the evidence to be obtained from the great writers of ancient and modern literature is a far more satisfactory proof of the diverging points of view in the ancient and modern world. When I think of the Greek tragedians and the great Latin poets, I fail to recall any passages which can compare with Milton's, Lycidas, your sorrow, is not dead;

or, again,

a death like sleep,

A gentle wafting to immortal life;

or Shakespeare's,

Death once dead, there's no more dying then;

or Wordsworth's,

We are seven;

or the noble passage of Pascal beginning,

Je tends les bras à mon Libérateur; . . .

or the closing words of Goethe's Faust,

Sie ist gerichtet! Ist gerettet!

or the fine lines of Schiller,

Noch am Grabe pflanzt er die Hoffnung auf;

and again,

Er ist ein Fremdling und wandert aus,
Er sucht ein unvergänglich Haus;

or Collins',

This old worn-out stuff, which is threadbare to-day,
May become everlasting to-morrow;

or Cowper's,

He is a happy man, whose life e'en now
Shows somewhat of that happier life to come:

or even Byron's,

The all of thee that cannot die."

Indeed, the apotheosis of choice and illustrious spirits of the ancient world, and the faith in the immortality of pre-eminent teachers, like Plato and Diogenes, seem inexplicable except by contrast with the gloomy and joyless thoughts of death which were generally prevalent. I know of nothing in the whole of Christian literature which strikes such an inexpressibly mournful note of despair as the famous speech of Achilles in the eleventh Book of the Odyssey, Μῆ δὲ μοι θάνατον γε παράδωκε . . .

though, as St. Beuve justly observes, Homer represents the ancient mind at the zenith of its joyousness and naturalness; and I challenge any critic to produce even from Plato any passage to match that magnificent passage at the close of the first part of the "Pilgrim's Progress" which no literary student with the slightest sense of beauty of thought and language can read without deep emotion. These are palmary instances of the great contrast between the two tempers and the two ages which to my mind cannot be overborne by quotations from lesser men.

I am tempted to quote passages by way of parallel and contrast from two great works of Hindoo and Buddhist literature, the Bhagavadgita and the Dhammapada, but I must forbear.

[By the Deputy Warden of Toynbee Hall. It includes a number of "essays" written by school-boys in East London on the way they spent a certain Saturday. Recommends the formation of committees to take individual interest in the children in their play-hours; and reveals, incidentally, that the style of English taught in the schools is infinitely genteel. One boy "proceeded" to the newspaper office to get papers to sell, went home to "have a little refreshment" (he means his dinner), "assisted" his father to sell out his goods, and "retired to bed" about ten o'clock.]

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

PSYCHE AND SOMA

By WELLEN SMITH.

3s. 6d. net.

The incompatibility of the ideals of soul-life with the necessities of body-life is here set forth in dramatic form, in the persons of Psyche and Soma, in order to adapt itself to the varying mood of each, and the better to display the circumstances of the conflict waged between them—a conflict which is not restricted to any time or place or race, but which has been common to mankind ever since the man-nature and the woman-nature conceived it possible to reconcile the natural wants of the one with the highest aspirations of the other.

THE LITERARY WEEK

IN our "Books Received" columns last week we commented very briefly on a volume of "essays" by East London school-boys, each describing how he had spent a certain Saturday; and we singled out for special mention one which was remarkable for the grandiloquence of its language. The youngster "arose" at half-past seven, "aroused" his mother, "proceeded" to Spitalfields Market, whither he was "accompanied" by others of his family, "proceeded" to the newspaper offices for papers to sell, and at the dinner hour went home "to have a little refreshment." It need scarcely be stated that at the close of the day he "retired" to bed. He is not alone in his dignity. Few of these boys condescend to "get up," to "wake" their families, to "go" anywhere. The cause in this case is probably the teaching they receive; but it is the newspapers, we suspect, which are largely responsible for the love of long words which all must have noticed among the poor.

Farm labourers used to speak of their "mates." We heard lately of one who called attention to his "colleague" at the other end of the field. We inquired once of an old plumber, who was doing odd jobs about the house, how he spent his evenings. His reply was: "Well, sir, I occasionally enter into conversation with my son;" and a servant of our acquaintance, when asked if she had seen some soldiers pass the end of the street, replied, in a tone of correction: "Madam, I observed them very distinctly." But the same servant invariably talks of a "Proosian" cat, and has been known to make woeful "howlers." Ignorance goes hand in hand with "culture" in amusing simplicity. A very entertaining article in the current Contemporary on "Culture among the Poor," by Miss M. Loane, one of the Queen's Nurses, gives an instance of a woman who believed that by becoming a "defaulter" her son had been advanced in rank; and the servant of a friend of ours, on being asked whether a certain patient was "convalescent," replied: "Oh! no, sir; not nearly so bad as that." Was there, perhaps, a touch of natural delicacy in the expression used by a maid, who, shortly after a guest had left the house, came to inform her master that Mr. X. had left his "candelabras" on the bed?

We should like to be informed by some experienced person whether the use of long words is kept for conversation with "the quality" (if that term still lives), or whether it is common in the home circle as well. Every one who keeps servants knows that there is one voice for the kitchen, another for the mistress; and it may be so with the words used. In that case, Miss Loane's comment on the complete insensibility to style among the poor, even among those of them who read good literature, needs a little softening. We can well believe that one of her most intelligent patients could hardly be convinced that "Adam Bede," "Jane Eyre," and "East Lynne" were not all the work of one author; but, if our suggestion be valid, it knocks the bottom out of a delightful story of a bluejacket, which we cannot forbear quoting. Asked to account for a furious fight which had taken place on the lower deck, he told his captain: "Well, sir, all I says to 'im was, 'Thomas, will you kindly get out o' my hammick?' " The contrast between what he must actually have said and the "company language" which he adopted for his captain's ear shows a very distinct sense of style.

Until he knows all the facts, the wise man holds his tongue. The public does not know all the facts relating to the sudden retirement by the Trustees of the British Museum of Dr. Ray Lankester from his post of Director of the Natural History Department. It cannot, therefore, judge the action of the Trustees. But this will be plain to everybody: that the Trustees would have to make out a very strong case indeed against so distinguished a man; so able a scientist, so active and practical a Director as Dr. Ray Lankester, before their treatment of him—retirement at the very earliest possible date and at the most inconvenient and galling moment—could be accepted as just or wise. When the Government tempted him from the life post of Linacre Professor at Oxford and a salary of £900 a year, it was known to some few that there was dissension among the Trustees; not all approved of the appointment of Dr. Ray Lankester. That appointment having once been made, it should have been loyally adhered to.

Whatever the cause of complaint against the ex-Director may be, it cannot be that his work has proved him unfit for the post. Men of science all the world over know what he has done. It is more probable that the authoritative body is unable to appreciate what others have learned to value. That the three Principal Trustees by whom the Director of the Natural History Department is appointed are the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor and the Speaker, is a circumstance that may raise a smile, but is of little practical import. The selection is actually made by the Trustees, a body which includes too few men of science able to understand the scope and results of Dr. Ray Lankester's work, and is therefore more liable to be influenced by other considerations than that of "mere merit." That may be one reason for the present unhappy exhibition of official severity. It must be remembered, on the other hand, that Dr. Ray Lankester was not born a Civil Servant. He became one at fifty or fifty-one; an age at which a man, though not past great intellectual work, is too old to begin learning the paces of the adept Civil Servant. A man of Dr. Ray Lankester's pronounced character may well have found the uniform a little constraining.

Still, as we have said, the facts are not fully known, and judgment cannot be passed. But two things, at least, are certain. In the first place, it would be impossible, now, for Dr. Ray Lankester to return to the Natural History Museum with any chance of being comfortable or of doing good work. In the second place, unless the Government wishes to commit sheer waste of a great brain and a great capacity for work, Dr. Ray Lankester's pension must be so adjusted that, instead of the beggarly £300 a year offered to a man of sixty, it reaches a sum which will enable him to devote his still youthful energies to scientific work, unhampered by sordid anxieties. Neglect of this will amount to wilful destruction of a most valuable national property.

In the ACADEMY of May 5 last, we described the Oxford Exhibition of portraits of English historical personages who died between 1714 and 1837; and now we have been turning over with keen interest the handsome Illustrated Catalogue published by the Clarendon Press (7s. 6d. net). Here those who were unable to get to Oxford in the spring may see, adequately reproduced, the likenesses of many of the great eighteenth-century men of letters. Here are no less than three portraits of Edward Gibbon; Romney's rather affected work forms the frontispiece, and Walton's and Reynolds's portraits occupy another page. Here is Simon du Bois's Addison on the same page with Richardson's wigless Nat Prior. Charles Jervas's(?) beautiful picture of Pope stands side by side with Thomas Gibson's penetrating vision of Sacheverell, and a few pages further we find Jervas's(?) Jonathan Swift in gown and bands.

Highmore's Edward Young, Baltoni's and Pine's portraits of Garrick, Reynolds's Thomas Warton and Joseph Warton, T. Phillips's Heber and Lawrence's Canning—these are only a few of the interesting portraits reproduced. And, for a change, the idler may turn to the diaphanous spirituality of the features of John Wesley, or the majesty of a very different but equally characteristic class of divine—that Archbishop Markham whose Life we reviewed not long ago; a man of whom Walpole wrote that "his business was rather in courting the great; he had a great deal of pomp, especially when he lifted his hand, lowered it, and repeated Latin verses."

It was a period full of great men, and, for ourselves, we know of few pleasures greater than the study of these faces of great men gone. What chins they had in the eighteenth century, what cheeks, what chests! Solid men; men, most of them, of reason not of passion. In this gallery of jowls John Wesley and Pope seem like ghosts, and the thinner type, like Canning, which came in towards the close of the period, seems almost finicking. Were they greater men than we are? They certainly looked it

The value of the book is immensely increased by the biographical notes, descriptions and provenances, by good Indexes, and by Mr. Lionel Cust's fine introduction. These volumes, as they appear, are not only delightful pastimes for a sultry afternoon but valuable works of reference to be kept on the shelves.

Two little books of extracts now before us offer an interesting contrast. "G. M. T.," whose initials will be recognised at once by all Meredithians, has made a "Meredith Pocket-book," and Miss Alice M. Warburton a "Browning Treasure Book." G. M. T., needless to say, has done his work well; the Browning book is compiled a little too much on the principle of "Mill on Liberty—Ditto on the Floss." And, besides, you cannot well separate from any of Browning's poems one or more stanzas without losing their effect. Browning is an argumentative poet. Everything he says must be taken in connection with what went before and what comes after, the whole forming an argument or exposition. Select, and you lose the thread.

And again, the first thing necessary to the short extract is that it shall be perfectly expressed. Browning was not a master of perfect expression. His effect is cumulative. The rough-hewn sentence or stanza is all very well in its place; detach it and you see its ruggedness. With Mr. Meredith, on the other hand, you have a master of expression, a writer from any one of whose pages you may pick a sentence or a passage, an essential part of the whole but also fit to be seen by itself, an unset, perfectly cut jewel. "If you insist on having women rooted to the bed of the river, they'll veer with the tides, like water-weeds, and no wonder," he writes in "One of our Conquerors"; and one may ponder over the simplicity and depth of the sentence, seeing ever new beauty and truth. "You know, dear Evan, when two people love, there is no such thing as owing between them." There is much more in that than appears at first sight.

After studying G. M. T.'s book, it is almost painful to turn to Miss Warburton's and watch Browning struggling to express his thoughts. But the difference lies deeper than in the matter of expression. Both writers are optimists; both brave men who love life and human beings and the beautiful world. But Mr. Meredith will give you a gayer heart than Browning when you take him from your pocket during the pause in a walk. He knows why he is an optimist, and points you on to the road by which the future good is to be attained: Browning throws you back on your faith, and so succeeds, for all his own high courage, in impressing you only the more deeply with the miseries of the present state.

Last week the ACADEMY discussed the dubious poetry on which our youths are brought up. It would seem that the criticism on which they are fed also needs inquiry. Here is a quotation from one of our scholastic Baedekers: "The ginger-pop school. John Hookham Frere, Byron and Barry Cornwall: so called by David Macbeth Moir. The production of these poets was characterised by their light humour, picturesque narrative and a mixture of the absurd and farcical with the pathetic and majestic. They bore the same relation to high imaginative verse as ginger-pop bears to champagne." Fancy Byron in such company—the only English poet with the exception of Shakespeare who is known through the length and breadth of Europe!

Here is a gem on Browning. "He is the author of the delicious lines:

Never the time and the place,
And the loved one all together!

which, apart from its context seems rather to suggest the Maid's Tragedy or the wet Sunday out. George Eliot is described in the best goody-goody style, as "a painstaking and conscientious writer. The moral tendency of her novels is in the highest degree beneficial."

In "The Modern Age" the following are classed as stars in English literature: Wilkie Collins, Blackmore, Ballantyne, James Payn, Henty, Miss Braddon, Rhoda Broughton, Rider Haggard, Hall Caine, Marie Corelli, Joseph Hocking, Baring Gould, Rev. Edward Bradley, and Max Pemberton. Rhoda Broughton "has amused a great number of readers by writing quite a score of novels." We wonder whether the critics found her equally funny. In the chronological tables at the end, the list of masterpieces begins with Caedmon, and after 1870 it expands, till in 1900 the total number of chef d'œuvres for the year reaches fifteen. The author, in his preface, expresses the hope that those who see the book will "read for themselves the excellent work in which almost everything conjoined with English literature is to be found." So unhappy a conjunction makes one inclined to pass on to the interjections.

The hundredth anniversary this month of the birth of John Sterling may serve to recall the circumstance that it was to his father, Captain Edward Sterling—who after giving up farming in the Isle of Bute, became, in the second decade of last century, a contributor to the Times—that the term "thunderer" was first applied. In 1833 John Sterling published anonymously "Arthur Coningsby," a novel, in which was incorporated some stirring verse. In 1833 he founded a club which later bore his name, its membership including Allan Cunningham, Carlyle, Mill, Milner, Spedding, Tennyson and Thirlwell. Francis William Newman was the intimate of Sterling's later years, and to him he confided the guardianship of his son. It was the inadequate and, as he judged, misleading character of Julius Hare's memoir of Sterling, published in 1848, five years after his death, that induced Carlyle to undertake the masterpiece of biography which links his name with that of his friend.

The cottage at Kinnesswood, a Kinross-shire lane, lying at the base of one of the Lomonds, in which Michael Bruce passed his brief life (1746-67), has been restored by some admirers of the Scottish poet, and been opened as a Bruce museum. Besides Bruce's personal belongings—his books, manuscripts, and correspondence—there have been gathered together and placed in the little cottage some furniture of the period and a collection of the books treasured in Scottish homes in the eighteenth century. Though Michael Bruce has always had a number of valiant defenders of his claims to the authorship of the ode "To the Cuckoo," a consensus of opinion assigns the "magical stanzas," as the elder D'Israeli styled them, to John Logan, the college friend who published Bruce's poems in 1770. In Chambers's "Cyclopædia of Literature" and Mr. Quiller-Couch's Oxford anthology of verse "To the Cuckoo" is in each case printed over John Logan's name.

A writer in the Scottish Review bemoans the fact that Scotsmen of the present day do not speak of Boswell, the prince of biographers, and neither read him nor think of him. The paternal home of the Boswells in Auchinleck, where Samuel Johnson and Boszy's father, the Edinburgh Lord of Session, exchanged fierce verbal thrusts, has a forsaken air of loneliness, we learn, and is now occupied for only a few months in the year. In the summer of 1777 James Boswell wrote to Dr. Johnson from the little country house on the south side of Edinburgh, "from the window of which I see around me a verdant grove, and beyond it the lofty mountain called Arthur's Seat." Like many modern Scots, James Boswell preferred London as a place of residence to the "inclement city" of his birth; still, there is validity in the writer's plea that "surely we are yet to see a statue rise to 'Jamie Boswell'; the silent house at Auchinleck a place of pilgrimage; and the little house across the Meadows with its finger-post for guidance and its tablet on the wall."

In the Fortnightly Review a literary agent attempts a reply to the charges recently brought against his profession by Mr. Henry Holt, the American publisher: but his proper enthusiasm for his calling induces him to take a line a little too high to be practical. His paper should be headed "the ideal literary agent"; for the agent he describes is one who will not only bring the highest possible commercial advantage to both publisher and author, but will "encourage the maintenance of a close literary relationship between authors and publishers." If we think for a moment what that means, it will be clear that the "literary agent of the future" is too good a being for this world. A, a novelist, has written a successful novel; B, his publisher, asks him for another, of course through C, his agent. But C happens to know that since A published that novel another firm of publishers has become desperately anxious for novels of that kind, and is willing to pay A half as much again as B is prepared to offer. What is C's duty? To "maintain the close literary relationship" between A and B, or to get for A the biggest profit he can? Whichever he does, he will be in the black books of either author or publishers.

Still, this interesting paper suggests several ways in which the literary agent may be of real service, and points out an ideal not all of which is too high to follow. The first step necessary is one which the writer of the paper suggests—the abolition of the agent who takes a fee for the effort to place work which he knows is unworthy of his trouble. There are too many of such gentlemen, and their position is on a par with that of the theatrical "agent" who takes a preliminary fee for entering in his books the name of some unhappy, stage-struck girl whom he knows to have no qualification for the stage, even if he had the means (which he usually has not) of finding her an engagement. To say that this should never be done, should, in fact, be made illegal, is not to set up the literary agent as a judge of literature. For it is open to the author to do without him, to send round his manuscripts himself; and, if young writers would grasp the fact that, unless the label of the agent bears a name that Editors and publishers have learned to respect, its appearance on a manuscript tells, not for, but very strongly against, its chances of serious consideration, we should hear less of the abuse than we do.

In the complaint of the "commercialisation of literature" we do not much believe. It is no worse to-day than it was a hundred years ago. Goldsmith writing his Natural History is a picture of wasted gifts that no modern "slave of the pen" could surpass. Authors have been very much the same in all ages. They wrote for money: those who had the strength of character to resist dissipation or greed wrote their best and made as much money as they wanted; those who sold themselves would, as likely as not, have fallen a victim to some other weakness in their nature if that particular temptation had been spared them. And the writer of to-day who deliberately writes below his best for the sake of extra royalties displays a weakness of character which would be vulnerable at some other point if that were protected. The "commercialisation of literature" has, as a matter of fact, nothing to do with literature. It may help to flood the world with trash; it has no effect on literature proper, which has always been supplied and demanded in small quantities, by a few for a few.

A new society, called the Malone Society, has just been formed for the printing of old plays in strict conformity with the most authentic texts, and also for the publishing of documents and information which may be of interest to students of the English drama. The following are among the members: Messrs. F. S. Boas, A. H. Bullen, Henry Bradley, Alois Brandl, E. K. Chambers, W. McN. Dixon, Edward Dowden, Oliver Elton, Ewald Flügel, T. Gregory Foster, C. M. Gayley, Israel Gollancz, H. F. Heath, W. P. Ker, Sidney Lee, J. M. Manly, A. W. Pollard, Walter Raleigh, George Saintsbury. At the first meeting, recently held under the chairmanship of Dr. Gregory Foster, Mr. W. W. Greg, Park Lodge, Wimbledon, was appointed Honorary Secretary and General Editor. The society hopes to issue eight or ten plays a year.

The Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall begin on this day week, August 18. The sixty programmes have all been drawn out, and may be obtained at the box-office. On Monday evenings the first half of each programme will be devoted exclusively to Wagner. On Wednesdays a symphony and other classical items will be included. On Fridays Beethoven's Nine Symphonies will be performed in chronological order, his compositions practically supplying the first part of the concert on each of these evenings. The programmes for Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays are of a more popular nature. Mr. Henry J. Wood will conduct the whole of each concert excepting the last orchestral item.

Attention is called by the Committee of the Walker Art Gallery, Liverpool, to the Historical Exhibition of Liverpool Art which is to be held there in May 1907, and which, it is hoped, will be thoroughly representative of the large amount of artistic talent produced by the city within and without its Academy of Arts. Full particulars may be obtained of the Secretary, Mr. E. Rimbault Dibdin, who invites communications on all subjects connected with the art and artists of Liverpool.

Owing to the increasing pressure of his duties at the Law Society, where the system of legal education is developing steadily, Mr. Edward Jenks is resigning the editorship of the Independent Review, which he has held for the last three years. His successor is Mr. C. Roden Buxton, who has been associated with the Review from its foundation, and under whose guidance the traditions of the Review will be maintained.

LITERATURE

AESCHYLUS IN ENGLISH VERSE

Aeschylus's Seven against Thebes and Persians in English verse.
By ARTHUR S. WAY, M.A. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. WAY has so clearly achieved his place in the first rank of translators in verse of the ancient classical poets that in quoting specimens of his work we are rather catering for the pleasure of our readers than affording evidence of a proposition already proved. His rendering of Euripides is by far the best as yet produced, and we hold that he has gone nearer to reproducing the spirit and manner of the Iliad and Odyssey than any other translator in verse.

The grim majesty of the diction of the Persians is thoroughly felt and most skilfully reproduced by Mr. Way. He catches the spirit of the fine choral ode (65-139) following the anapaestic introy which describes the huge amorphous host of Xerxes that went to the war :

For the army of the King, for the city-wasting host
Long since hath passed the channel of the fronting neighbour-coast ;
For they linked the rafts together with the cables cunningly,
So that Hellas' strait was spanned,
Land was riveted to land,
And man had cast a yoke upon the wild neck of the sea !
(Str. 1.)

And myriad-peopled Asia's King, a battle-eager lord,
From utmost east to utmost west sped on his countless horde
In unnumbered squadrons marching, in fleets of keels untold,
Knowing none dared disobey,
For stern overseers were they
Of the godlike King begotten of the ancient Race of Gold.
(Ant. 1.)

And, flashing from his eyes the deadly dragon's steel blue glance,
On Assyrian battle-car,
With unnumbered men of war
He hurls the war-god of the bow on the heroes of the lance.
(Ant. 2.)
Heroes ?—none is so heroic as to stem that warrior-flood !
Not their strongest dams shall bide
Such resistless ocean-tide :
Nay, Persia's valiant myriads shall in no wise be withstood.
(Mesode.)

Yet—God sendeth strong delusions, and what mortal may evade them ?
And who with foot light-leaping may spring clear of the snare ?
For Atê smiles alluring men, until she hath betrayed them
Amidst her net : none breaks its meshes, once entangled there.
(Str. 3.)

For the Gods' doom all-controlling decreed this long ago—
" Persia's sons shall win renown,
In dashing towers down,
In the clash of charging horsemen, and in cities' overthrow."
(Ant. 3.)

Yet they learn to look unquailing on the highways of the sea,
When the flails of tempest smite,
And its meadows blossom white,
Grasping slender reins of army-wafting galleys fearlessly.
(Str. 4.)

Hence mine heart is wrapped in gloom,
Racked with presages of doom,
Fear for Persia's chivalry,
Lest the city hear a cry—
" Susa doth dispeopled lie !"
(Ant. 4.)

Lest from Kissian streets be sent
Echoes of that wild lament,
Wail from multitudes far-borne,
As the thronging women mourn,
As the linen robes are torn.
(Str. 5.)

All our horse with these were lost,
Lost were all our footman-host !
All have followed hence their King, as forth the hive pour swarming bees,
treeming o'er the human-fashioned forelands parting neighbour seas, Forelands linking coast to coast.
(Ant. 5.)

Now is every marriage-bed
Drenched with tears as for the dead.
Persian wives are whelmed in sorrow : yearning each with breaking hea
For the battle-eager spearman whom she blithely saw depart
Sitteth lone, a wife unwed.

The description of the naval battle is very spirited (406-432):

Yea, and from us low thunder of Persian cheers
Answered—no time it was for dallying !
Then straightway galley dashed her beak of bronze
On galley. 'Twas a Hellene ship began
The onset, and shore all the figure-head
From a Phœnician :—captain charged on captain.
At first the Persian navy's torrent-flood Withstood them : but when our vast fleet was cramped
In strait space—friend could lend no aid to friend—
Then ours by fangs of allies' beaks of bronze
Were struck, and shattered all their oar-array ;
While with shrewd strategy the Hellene ships
Swept round, and rammed us, and upturned were hulls
Of ships ;—no more could one discern the sea,
Clogged all with wrecks and limbs of slaughtered men :
The shores, the rock-reefs, were with corpses strewn.
Then rowed each bark in fleeing disarray,
Yea, every keel of our barbarian host.
They with oar-fragments and with shards of wrecks
Smote, backed, as men smite tunnies, or a draught
Of fishes ; and a moaning, all confused
With shrieking, hovered wide o'er that sea-brine
Till night's dark presence blotted out the horror.
That swarm of woes, yea, though for ten days' space
I should rehearse, could I not tell in full.
Yet know this well, that never in one day
Died such a host, such tale untold, of men.

We wish we had space to quote the choral invocation of the ghost of Darius and the grand commos of the chorus and Xerxes with which the play reaches a stately conclusion. There is only one metre in the handling of which Mr. Way is not quite successful. The English trochaic septenarius demands a pause after the fourth trochee. Verses like :

All the stately fabric that Darius reared by heaven's grace, do not convey the effect of the trochaic metre

In the Persians Mr. Way has no rival to contend with except himself and his own established reputation. This ordeal he has met with undoubted success. He is as successful with Aeschylus as with Euripides. In his rendering of the Seven against Thebes he has a formidable rival in the spirited and poetical prose version of Dr. Verrall. We have always admired Dr. Verrall's translation of verses 109 and 110 (for the Greek we must refer our readers to the text):

For round about the citadel is seething a human wave of sloping crests, driven on by the breath of War.

Though shackled by the fetters of rhyme, Mr. Way is as literal and perhaps even more poetical in :

Round the city the war-tides sway ;
Helm-plumes are their flying spray
By the War-god blown to the fray.

But in 332 Dr. Verrall is more forcible as well as literal with :

And a woeful thing it is for the fresh maids to pass the hated threshold of those that will wait no rites ere they pluck the flower, than the verse translator with :

Alas, that maids, whose girlhood scarce hath fled,
On paths of miseries
Should, ere the spousal rites, from home be sped !

Our last extract shall be from the choral lament over Eteocles and Polynices (895-928). The reader who has Dr. Verrall's edition will find that the rendering in verse is nearly as literal as the almost equally poetical prose version :

Smitten and carven with iron in such ill plight are they ying :
And a prize, one carven with iron, for him as for him doth abide.
" What prize can there be for the dead ?" one asketh : answer him, crying :
" Palaces iron-delved in their fatherland, side by side."

And the wail far-piercing shall speed them, a home for a home who are leaving,

Sighing that rendeth the breast, grief from the soul that springs,
Grief from a torn heart joyless, and tears of unfeigned grieving :
For my heart is weeping itself away for the twain—my kings !

What praises shall Hadesward waft them, o'er these forlorn ones pealing?

Say of him: "Like a hero he battled—ah me, with his motherland!"

And of him: "From his terrible onset the ranks of the aliens reeling Heaps upon heaps war-blasted fell 'neath his ruining hand."

Woe for the woman who bare them, ill-starred beyond all other
Was she, yea, more than they all which have born the fruit of the womb!

Her son for a husband she took to herself; she became their mother!
One seed—and such end have they found, who gave each to his brother a tomb!

O yea, of one seed were the twain, of their heritage made they partition:

In no lovingkindness, nay, but in madness of strife was it done;
And their feud's consummation, behold, is their own and their house's perdition:

Ceased is their hate: in the earth their blood mingles, the twain are at one.

Oh but in truth are they now of one blood, and a bitter decider
Of this their dispute was the oversea stranger that leapt out of fire,
Even the whetted steel: of possessions a bitter divider
Was the War-fiend who brought to fulfilment the curse of a father's ire.

No more characteristically Aeschylean stanza than the last could be culled from the extant plays. The terrible equivocal in δαίμοι, meaning both "of one blood" and "whose blood is mingled" (in death by each other's hands), and the mystic impersonation of the sword that brought to fulfilment the father's curse, breathe the very quintessence of the Aeschylean style, and are faithfully and finely reproduced in Mr. Way's version.

THE ENGLISH TONGUE

Growth and Structure of the English Language. By OTTO JESPERSEN, Ph.D. (Nutt, M. 3.)

THIS is a good book. It would form an excellent introduction to the historical study of the English language. It may be recommended as a serviceable book for the beginner, and it is probable that the advanced student and the ripe scholar will find in it much to interest and to instruct, much to think about and scarcely anything to dispute or to controvert. For it is the work of a man who is a thorough master of his subject, who has learnt much and thought much on the many difficult problems of language which present themselves both on the phonetic side and on the psychological and philosophical side of the subject. The writer is not merely a swallower of other men's formulas. There is an independent play of thought in Professor Jespersen's exposition which is not so very common in the work of philologists. Dr. Jespersen is not only a scholar possessed of wide and accurate learning but a man of sound and sober judgment, so that he is a safe guide on many matters discussed in the book, which have been often lately the subjects of warm controversy in journals devoted to literature and even in the daily press.

And now for the scope and plan of the volume. The aim of the author is to characterise the chief peculiarities of the English language. He attempts to connect the teachings of linguistic history with the chief events in the general history of the English people, and to show the relation of language to national character. His plan is first to give a rapid sketch of the language of our own days, especially as it strikes a foreigner. Then he enters upon the history of the language, describes its connection with the other languages of the Indo-Germanic family, and traces the various foreign influences it has undergone. Last, he gives an account of its own internal development. The book is divided into ten chapters. First, we have the Preliminary Sketch connecting the marked features of the modern language, phonetic and syntactic, with the characteristic qualities of Englishmen. Then comes a chapter on the Beginnings: the changes brought about in the Germanic dialects by consonant-shift and still more by shift of stress; the loan-words from Latin borrowed by our Germanic ancestors before they left their homes on the continent; the Frisian origin of the English people. The next chapter gives an interesting account of Scandinavian influences on the English language. The vikings introduced a great number of terms connected with law and the civil administration of the Danelagh. One of the very most important words in English is the word "law," a word due to the Danish invaders. The words "Riding" (of Yorkshire), and "Rape" (in Sussex) are still with us to remind us of the Danish talent for civil organisation. Then come chapters on French additions and on Latin and Greek elements introduced after the Renaissance. The next chapter contains an account of additions to the language from various sources, namely miscellaneous foreign words, new formations, and words used in new senses. The last three chapters deal with interesting points of grammar, with Shakespeare and the language of poetry, and with supplementary matters such as the influence of the Bible, profane language, prudery, etc.

A few points may now be mentioned upon which writers on the English language have often made statements or expressed opinions which will not stand the test of an exact scientific criticism, but upon which Professor Jespersen has always something to say worthy of consideration. He objects to the first consonant-shift being called Grimm's law, for one reason, because the Danish scholar, Rasmus Rask, was the first to set forth clearly the sound-correspondences—as early as 1814, eight years before Jacob Grimm made it generally known in his Grammar; for another, because Grimm's manner of stating it has been considerably modified by recent investigations. He has a good deal to say in disproof of Max Müller's famous dictum that a farm-labourer uses only three hundred words. He does not believe that the district now called Angel in South Jutland (Slesvig) was the home of the Anglians, but holds that the Kentish and Anglian dialects point rather to a Frisian emigration. He has a good deal that is interesting to say about the verbal substantive ending in -ing, and does not believe with some scholars that our present participle ending in -ing is a direct and phonetic representative of the O.E. participial form in -ende. He shows how this verbal noun can enter into a compound, as in walking-stick, a church-going bell. Examples are given of the shortening of the vowel in the first element of compounds, as in husband, huzzy, knowledge, Whit-Sunday. The use of the split infinitive in moderation, and where necessary for rhythm or emphasis is defended, and illustrated from Burns's line:

Who dared to nobly stem tyrannic pride.

The use of "reliable," the most abused word in the English language, is defended as an innocent necessary word, respectable on the score of antiquity. According to the "New English Dictionary" the word occurs as early as the year 1569. The formation of new words by subtracting something from old ones, commonly called "back-formation" is treated as a legitimate process, as in difficult from difficulty, to jeopard from jeopardy, to burgle from burglar, to swashbuckle from swashbuckler. The fixed s of the plural as in the phrase "by this means" is illustrated by such examples as "an honourable amends," an innings, a barracks, a golf links. Our plural s is shown to be due to the gaining ground of the native plural in -as, and not to the old French accusative plural, as has been held by some scholars. Professor Jespersen agrees with Dr. Murray on the pronunciation of "doctrinal" with shortening of the Latin i, and stress on the first syllable, and from Fitzedward Hall's examples shows to what absurdities an unswerving conformity with Latin vowel quantity would bring us in the pronunciation of Latin words introduced into English. The learned professor has some very good remarks on a slavish deference to Latin syntax in the composition of an English sentence, and is very severe on the "almighty schoolmaster." He quotes with approbation the words of Huxley: "The Genius of the English language is widely different from that of Latin; the worst and the most debased kinds of the English style are those which ape Latinity. I know of no purer English prose than that of John Bunyan and Daniel Defoe . . . yet Latin literature and these masters of English had little to do with one another."

Scattered up and down the pages of the book there are many interesting explanations of special words. Few people are aware of the historical associations of the word "cheap," used as an adjective, and as an element in local names such as Cheapside and Eastcheap. The word is thought to be due ultimately to a very early borrowing from the Latin caupo, "a wine-dealer." This word and "wine" show at what an early date the favourite Italian drink was appreciated by the beer-drinking Germans. Bugge's highly probable derivation of "heathen" from the Greek ethnos is referred to in a note. "Window" is a Scandinavian borrowing, compare Icelandic vindauga ("wind-eye"), based on the eye-shape of the windows in the old wooden houses, compare O.E. ēagthyrel ("eye-hole"), and Russian okno, "window," from oko, "eye." The Scandinavian knives were probably better than, or at any rate different from, those of the nations among whom they intruded, for our "knife" as well as the French canif are borrowed from our northern invaders. The derivation of the word "Yankee" has for a long time been an unsolved puzzle. Dr. Jespersen mentions with approval the explanation recently set forth by Professor H. Logeman. It is suggested that the term was originally applied to the Dutch colonists in North America, such as the inhabitants of new Amsterdam, now New York. The original form of the word was Jan Kees, a nickname still applied in Flanders to people from Holland. For the loss of the s compare our "pea" from an older "pease," and the forms Chinese, Maltee, Portugee. Jan is, of course, the common Dutch name corresponding to "John." As to Kees opinions differ, the more probable one being that it is a dialectal variation of the Dutch kaas, "cheese," a typically Dutch product.

Perhaps enough has been said to show how varied is the interesting information to be found in this book. It is quite impossible in a brief notice to give any adequate idea of its sterling worth, the accurate scholarship, the skilful marshalling of significant facts, the well-balanced judgment of which there is evidence on every page.

FRIEND ELLWOOD

The History of the Life of Thomas Ellwood. Written by his own hand. With extracts from Joseph Wyeth's Supplement. Edited by S. GRAVESON. (Headley, 10s. net.)

It is now nearly two hundred years since Ellwood's autobiography was first "Printed and sold by the Assigns of J. Sowle, in White-Hart-Court, in Gracious Street." Since then, eleven editions have been issued—one as recently as 1900—but in some the text has been abridged and modernised, while others have omitted Joseph Wyeth's Supplement entirely, thus depriving the book of much of its value as a faithful reflection of the man and his environment. In the volume before us the editor has wisely returned to the original spelling and the typographical peculiarities of the early eighteenth century, giving us extracts from the Supplement, a good bibliography, and—a valuable addition—biographical notes. His work has been well done, and, save for a few unimportant printer's errors and the superfluous "historical introduction," which is not even accurate, we find little to which we can take exception.

Thomas Ellwood was born at Crowell, in the Vale of Aylesbury, in September or October 1639, a twelvemonth before the summoning of the Long Parliament, so that he was little over nine years of age when the Civil War ended with the execution of Charles. But "man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward"; and if Friend Ellwood missed those turbulent days, his life was one of unceasing persecution. At school he profited apace, having, he tells, "a natural Propensity to Learning. . . . And yet (which is strange to think of), few boys . . . wore out more Birch than I"; for:

being a little busie boy, full of Spirit, of a working Head and active Hand, I . . . was often playing one waggish Prank or other among my Fellow-Scholars, which subjected me to Correction, so that I have come under the Discipline of the Rod twice in a Forenoon. Which yet brake no Bones.

But his talent was, in a measure, allowed to rust, for his father, having become a Justice of the Peace, "put himself into a Port and Course of Living agreeable thereunto," and in order to retrench expenses withdrew the boy from school—a proceeding which, as Ellwood quaintly remarks: "was somewhat like plucking green Fruit from the Tree, and laying it by before it was come to its due Ripeness; which will thenceforth shrink and wither, and lose that little Juice and Relish which it began to have." After leaving school he parted company with his books and entered with zest into the sports and pleasures of the times, though, he is careful to tell us: "I always sorted my self with Persons of Ingenuity, Temperance and Sobriety; for I loathed Scurrilities in Conversation, and had a natural Aversion to Immoderate Drinking." Then came the turning-point in his career. Accompanying his father on a visit to Isaac Penington, who had purchased an estate at Chalfont and turned Quaker: "it pleased the Lord, in his Infinite Goodness, to call me out of the Spirit and Ways of the World," and he joined the Community of Friends. From this date till his death in 1713, despite the fact that "the Enemy, transforming himself into the Appearance of an Angel of Light," from time to time gained subtle advantages over him, his life was given up to devotion and to the service of his cause.

In Puritan England it was customary not only for the master of the house to wear his hat constantly indoors, but for men of quality to retain their headgear even in church. The Quakers strenuously opposed all "hat-honour," refusing to pay to man a homage often denied to God, and Friend Ellwood was at first much exercised in his mind, the Enemy suggesting that he should "make a Difference between my Father and all other Men." But in the end he was shown the Light, and, going out to meet his father without removing his hat, was soundly drubbed for his insolence. To this and to two subsequent chastisements he submitted cheerfully, having "Peace and Quietness in my Mind, and being much more grieved for my Father than for my self." Shortly afterwards he went, at Isaac Penington's invitation, to reside at Chalfont Grange. For a year he has nothing to record save frequent attendances at Quaker meetings at Bledlow, two miles from Crowell, "in the House of one Thomas Saunders, who Professed the Truth; But his Wife, whose Name was Damaris, did Possess it," and at other places. Then, in 1661, in order that his neighbours should hear the Gospel "livingly and powerfully preached among them," he tries to secure the services of a Friend: his letter is intercepted, and he is arrested and carried before the Justices at Weston, they putting divers Questions to me relating to the present Disturbances in the Nation, occasioned by the late foolish Insurrection of those frantick Fifth-Monarchy-Men. To all which I readily Answered, according to the Simplicity of my Heart and Innocency of my Hands

Refusing to take the Oath of Allegiance, he was sent to Oxford, where he remained for some months in the custody of the City Marshal. The country had been in a ferment ever since the rising of the "frantick Fifth-Monarchy-Men," and the Justices, gladly seizing upon any pretext to persecute the Quakers, descended upon their meetings, accusing them of gathering for purposes of sedition, and on their refusing to sign an oath of allegiance to man, hurrying them off to prison. Friend

Ellwood regained his liberty, only to be taken again, with Isaac Penington and others, at a meeting at Chalfont and released on his own recognisances. Being anxious to resume his interrupted studies, he obtained an introduction to Milton, and read to him in Latin. He had, during his retirement, he tells us, so far recovered the rules of grammar "that I could read a Latin Author, and after a Sort hammer out his Meaning." Milton, however, found fault with his pronunciation, and a new difficulty presented itself:

It was now harder for me to read than it was before to understand when read. But . . . my Master . . . having a curious Ear, he understood by my Tone when I understood what I read and when I did not: and accordingly would stop me, Examine me, and open the most difficult Passages to me.

For six weeks he remained in London, reading to Milton in the afternoons and working by himself in the forenoons, but his studies were interrupted by an illness which forced him to return to the country. On his recovery he returned to London and was well received by his master; but, some suspicion of a plot arising, he was seized at a meeting at the Bull-and-Mouth in Aldersgate and carried off with his companions to Bridewell. The prisons were at this time filled with Quakers, yet Friend Ellwood was supplied with money by Isaac Penington and his brother, and seems, on the whole, to have fared very well. After two months' imprisonment "without having seen the Face of any Civil Magistrate," they were taken to the Old Bailey, and thence, after some quibbling, to Newgate, where they were "thrust into the Common-Side," and very ill-lodged. One of the Friends, however, died of disease, the Coroner condemned the insanitary condition of the room they occupied, and they were sent back to Bridewell and eventually released. Three years later Ellwood attended the funeral of a Friend at Amersham. As the procession passed up the street a Justice of the Peace rushed out of The Griffin inn with the Constable and a Rabble of Rude Fellows whom he had gathered together, and having his drawn Sword in his Hand, Struck one of the Foremost of the Bearers with it, Commanding them to set down the Coffin. But the Friend who was so stricken . . . being more concerned for the Safety of the Dead Body than his own, lest it should fall from his shoulder, and any Indecency thereupon follow, held the Coffin fast: Which the Justice observing, and being enraged that his Word (how Unjust soever) was not forthwith Obeyed, set his Hand to the Coffin, and with a forcible thrust threw it off from the Bearers Shoulders, so that it fell to the ground in the midst of the street, and there we were forced to leave it.

As a result of this he was committed to Aylesbury prison and detained there for a month.

We have been able to give but a brief account of Ellwood's earlier life: the persecution continued intermittently till his death at Hunger Hill in February 1713. His own History, written in a quaint, self-conscious style, takes us to 1683, and, with Joseph Wyeth's Supplement, furnishes a graphic picture of the times. He bore his frequent imprisonments with cheerful resignation, and is able to write:

It was a good Time, I think, to us all, for I found it so to me; the Lord being graciously pleased to visit my Soul with 'the refreshing Dews of his divine Life, whereby my Spirit was more and more quickened to him, and Truth gained ground in me over the Temptations and Snares of the Enemy. Which frequently raised in my Heart Thanksgiving and Praises unto the Lord.

But perhaps the one thing which will strike the reader most of all is the implicit faith placed by both justices and jailers in the word of the Quakers they attacked with an almost unparalleled bitterness. Ellwood gives a good example of this in his description of the return from Newgate to Bridewell:

We took our Bundles on our Shoulders, and walked Two and Two a-Breast through the Old Bailey into Fleet Street and so on to Old Bridewell. And it being about the Middle of the Afternoon, and the Streets pretty full of People, both the Shopkeepers at the Doors and Passengers in the Way would stop us, and ask us what we were, and whither we were going. And when we had told them we were Prisoners, going from one Prison to another (from Newgate to Bridewell), What, said they, without a Keeper! No, said we, for our Word, which we have given, is our Keeper. Some thereupon would advise us not to go to Prison, but to go home. But we told them we could not do so; we could suffer for our Testimony, but could not fly from it. I do not remember we had any Abuse offered us: but were generally pitied by the People.

Ellwood's literary work was almost entirely confined to pamphlets and books of a controversial nature, but during his confinement in Bridewell and afterwards he wrote several poems, including an attack on vice and priests and things in general entitled "Speculum Seculi: or, a Looking-Glass for the Times," and a hymn to God in which occur four lines which we cannot forbear quoting:

Thy matchless Love constrains my Life
Thy Life constrains my Love,
To be to Thee as Chaste a Wife
As is the Turtle-Dove!

In later years he commenced a Life of David in verse, but, the Prince of Orange landing and the Revolution following, "the Noise of Guns, and Sound of Drums, &c., so disturbed his Meditation and gentle Muse (which like the Halcion, breeds in Calm Weather) that his Poetical Genius left him." Much of his verse is not without merit, but Friend Ellwood appears to have worked his Pegasus hard and fed him indifferently, and his occasional jibbing is excusable.

CHWANG TZE

Musings of a Chinese Mystic. Selections from the Philosophy of CHUANG Tzŭ. With an Introduction by LIONEL GILES (Murray, 2s. net.)

In the age of Chwang Tze the Chinese were occupied with the same problem as that which the Greeks a few years before had failed to solve. Chin then threatened to overwhelm the brilliant civilisation of the weak and divided Chow states, as Macedonia had overwhelmed the brilliant civilisation of the weak and divided Greek states. But when the blow fell, the foolishness of Chwang Tze availed more than the wisdom of his contemporary, Demosthenes. "To trust to the sword," said the Chinaman, "is to perish." Instead of trying to avert disaster, he prepared his countrymen to encounter it. The event was that, from amid a ruin greater than that under which the spirit of Greece was crushed, the spirit of China arose undaunted and invigorated.

Chwang Tze was a man with a genius of a cast peculiarly Chinese. In it there were united things incongruous to a European mind: the fire and spirituality of a prophet, the depth and subtlety of a metaphysician, and the wit and irreverence of a satirist. Of the invaders he was not afraid. They were a blind instrument of Divine wrath, sent like a conflagration to a plague-stricken city to cleanse it and prepare the way for the re-builders. It was the Chows he feared, the native princes. Were they to succeed in collecting their corrupt and iniquitous dominions into a strong and entire empire, the plague would gather and infect the very soul of China. He refused, therefore, to play the part which Demosthenes was playing at Athens. It was moral strength that the country needed, not statesmanship. When affairs were in a bad way, the Prince of Chu asked him to take over the administration. He was quietly fishing when the messengers arrived, and went on fishing while they spoke. Then, without turning his head, he said: "I have heard that the Prince of Chu keeps a dead tortoise in a shrine on the altar of his ancestral temple. Do you think that tortoise would have preferred to die and receive these high honours, or to live and wag its tail in the mud?" "Doubtless," replied the messengers, "it would have preferred to live and wag its tail in the mud." "Begone," said the sage, "I too will live and wag my tail in the mud."

It was, however, his tongue that Chwang Tze wished still to wag. By a brilliant and subversive philosophy, expressed in amazing paradoxes, keen invectives and profound thoughts, he was then undermining the influence of the patriotic and pragmatist sophists of the Confucian school and sapping the authority of the Chow-rulers. The time was ripe for a reformer.

Although Confucius had been dead only a hundred and fifty years, his teaching had already begun to be discredited by its results. It was a system of utilitarian morality which, like some of the systems of mere ethics of modern agnostics, seemed to retain in the lifetime of its founder a source of vitality as perennial as that possessed by the ancient faith from which it was severed. But it was a tree cut off from its roots, and animated only by a scantling of the old sap. In the air of spring it had put out a few tufts of living leaves, but in the season of heat and drought, in which Chwang Tze lived, it was reduced to a sere and stricken thing. Under the influence of the sophists of the Confucian school, virtue was become a matter of calculation and rhetoric; law, a respectable branch of brigandage, and philosophy the iridescence of national decay. Even Mencius, the so-called St. Paul of Confucianism, had lost faith in the efficacy of didactic morality, and had reverted to that last resource of all agnostic regenerators of mankind, an economic view of human society. When Chwang Tze attacked him, he was engaged in an endeavour to establish the power of the state of Chi by amending its frame of government. It is the wisdom of the world, said the sage, to put one's treasures in a box and secure it with lock and bolt. But the wisdom of the world is serviceable most of all to the strong thief. He carries the box off on his shoulder and his only fear is that the lock and bolt may give way and some of the treasure be lost. Study the history of the country which you are trying to strengthen against the invader by this sort of wisdom. A hundred and fifty years since, Chi was the richest and best governed state in China. But a usurper then slew the prince and stole not only his dominions but his system of administration, and by means of this he established himself so securely that no one dared to assail him.

Chwang Tze's political stories are the wittiest of his writings. None of them exceeds ten pages in length, and none of them is surpassed in the qualities of irony, force and maliciousness by any similar work in the modern literature of the world. Confucius was his chief object of attack. He caricatured the Seneca of China; misrepresented him; placed him in ridiculous situations; and then, more fairly and more effectively, showed up his empty didacticism by contrasting it with the simple, natural habit of goodness formed by the spirit of righteousness in the soul of a poor, illiterate fisherman. In vain did the Confucianists appeal to the canonical books. The ancient books, said Chwang Tze, preserve the footprints of the wise men of old, but are footprints the same things as shoes? In order to walk in the ancient ways you must be shod with the ancient virtues. In order to find the ancient virtues you must recover the ancient faith. There, in the divine foolishness and the strength in weakness before which the power and the cunning of the world fade and are discomfited, there is the sure defence against the day of woe and disaster.

Chwang Tze, as Mr. Lionel Giles remarks in an admirable preface to a slight selection from the philosophical thoughts of the Chinese writer, was not an innovator. His monotheism was founded on the teaching of the "Old Master" of the sixth century B.C., and this teaching was, in turn, based upon ideas obtaining in China from time immemorial. What Chwang Tze did was to re-state the ancient creed in the terms of the thought of his age. Living in a period of agnosticism in which questions of science had been separated from questions of philosophy, and questions of ethics from questions of religion, he dealt with just those problems which sciolists think were never discussed until the modern era. His contemporaries were not ignorant of the idea of the evolution of species; some of them had, like Comte, elaborated a system of altruism; some had, like Nietzsche, erected in opposition thereto a system of egoism; while many, like Renan, had developed the doctrine of relativity of knowledge into the theory of bitter scepticism and the practice of amiable indifference.

The contradictions and complexities in the philosophies of his age have left their mark upon the writings of Chwang Tze. Instead of working out his ideas in an independent fashion and building them into a consistent frame of thought, he expands them singly in a series of criticisms upon the various points of view of his contemporaries. When attacking the agnostics he makes religion a matter of knowledge; when attacking the metaphysicians he makes knowledge a matter of mysticism; when attacking the ascetics he makes mysticism a matter of virtue; when attacking the moralists he makes virtue a matter of grace.

But if these different planes of thought are regarded as rising one above the other little discrepancy, we think, will be found, on examination, between them. Setting out against the position of the sceptics, Chwang Tze contends that the feelings of man can reach to God. The one divine white light which is manifested in broken colours in the laws of nature is reflected in all its original purity in the soul of the saint. As a sense of the Absolute is a matter of feeling and not a matter of intellection—here Chwang Tze seems to have anticipated Mr. F. H. Bradley—metaphysics is not an end but a means. It is, at best, an instrument of constructive scepticism. The Chinese sage employed it admirably in destroying the alternation theory which from the days of Hui Tze to the days of Herbert Spencer has been the grand dogma of Agnosticism. He shows that to reduce the subjective aspect of the universe to the idea of mind, and the objective aspect to the idea of matter or force, is to separate the parts from the whole in which alone they subsist, and from which alone they derive value and significance. These abstractions are merely symbols which are validly employed only in analytical psychology. In ending them with individuality and actual existence, men, like children at night-time, frighten themselves, by the spectres of their fancy, from the safe and easy road that would take them home. Subject and object are one in experience; and the dissociation of experience is as productive of errors in metaphysics as the dissociation of personality is productive of errors in practice.

On this base of wholesome scepticism Chwang Tze founded his theosophy. Philosophy was a matter of the intellect; theosophy was a matter of the will. When man had purged his mind from the illusions that prevented his soul from losing itself and finding itself in God, he had still to purify and confirm his desires. By asceticism? said the hermit. No, said the practical Chinamen; by fasting with the heart and working cheerfully in the world of men. That is to say, said the moralist, by performing one's duties and cultivating one's virtues? No, said the mystic, conscious virtue is not inward grace. Be child-like, natural, patient and humble. It is in the quietness of spirit and the rest of cares, in the evenness of recollection and the stillness of thought, that the soul becomes one with that Divine Power, which works in silence and abides unseen.

We shall never understand the strength of China until we understand her religion. In the course of two thousand and two hundred years the teaching of Chwang Tze has degenerated among the ignorant Taoists into a system of superstition as ridiculous as that into which the transcendentalism of Emerson is already decaying among the spiritualists and Christian scientists of America. But somewhat of the true spirit of the message of the Chinese prophet must surely survive in that great empire which it helped to preserve against the fate that has long since overtaken all other empires of the ancient world.

THE EARLY ENGLISH DRAMA SOCIETY

Early English Dramatists. The Proverbs, Epigrams and Miscellanies of John Heywood.—The Dramatic Writings of Ulpian Fulwell. Edited by JOHN S. FARMER. (Privately printed for subscribers by the Early English Drama Society.)

IN our review of the first four volumes published by the "Early English Drama Society," we expressed our regret that Mr. Farmer and his publisher Mr. Gibbings should have claimed for what appeared to be an ordinary trade venture the prestige of disinterestedness which attaches to work issued by a "Society." We also noted that the substitution of modern forms of words for Tudor ones frequently played havoc with metre and rhyme, and that in the play we selected for special examination the modernised text was not obtained by a new collation but was taken over bodily from the 1874 edition of Dodsley's Old Plays. The two volumes now submitted to us appear neither better nor worse than their predecessors. They are still advertised as issued by the "Early English Drama Society," though its "Secretary," Mr. Gibbings, has not accepted our offer to print the Society's constitution in our columns, has avowed that there is no intention of printing a balance-sheet, and by dispensing with some or all of the six Vice-Presidents whose names adorned his prospectus before our review appeared, has shorn the Society of the one testimony to its public character which it originally possessed. As regards the text, modern forms are still used instead of Tudor ones, e.g., "slippery" instead of "slyper," and "seldom" instead of "seld," and we learn from the bibliographical note that the text of Like will to Like (which, with the aid of forty-eight pages of blank paper figures as "The Dramatic Writings of Ulpian Fulwell"!) "follows that of Hazlitt." This in its turn was based on that of the quarto printed by John Allde in 1568 (Mr. Farmer's 1508 is, of course, a misprint, but should have been corrected), of which the unique copy is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. If this had been collated afresh for the present reprint we presume that Mr. Farmer would have said so, but we have not been able to get to Oxford to consult the original, so that we cannot tell to what extent readers are injured by the apparent omission. Mr. Farmer mentions the later edition of 1587, of which a copy is in the library of the British Museum, and this should of course have been quoted where it corrects the 1568 text. We gather, however, that Mr. Farmer has not troubled to look at it. Students of his "Note-book and Word-List" when they come upon the humorous entry "Varlorum Readings, etc." may think that we do him an injustice in this surmise, but they will find that the few variants which he records are brought together from stray foot-notes by Mr. Hazlitt, and give no evidence of independent collation. It may thus be gathered that Mr. Farmer, though he prefers to speak of Fulwell's Like will to Like as his "Dramatic Writings," has acted in the spirit of its title, tenderly preventing these new volumes of his series from putting their predecessors to shame by keeping them as like to them as possible.

As regards the literary value of Fulwell's play and Heywood's Proverbs not very much can be said for them. Like will to Like is interesting because here at least there is an orthodox "Vice" who, at the end of the play, rides off to hell on the devil's back, an incident which is much more prominent in histories of the drama than in the plays which have come down to us. It is also a tolerably good example of the extraordinary shallowness of the moral feeling which underlay the "moralities" in their later developments. As for Heywood's Proverbs, here and there they show flashes of shrewd humour, but the very readiness with which the author was prepared with an "Otherwise," or alternative version, is an indication of the carelessness with which they were thrown off. Both the play and the Proverbs are interesting to philologists and literary and social students, for they have a place, though far from an important one, in the evolution of the English language, English social and moral feeling, and the English drama. It is the more to be regretted that in the texts in which they are now represented quite one half of this interest is shorn away.

ROMAN PRIVATE LAW

Roman Private Law. By A. W. LEAGE. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

THE aim of this book is "to give, as simply as possible, the subject-matter of the Institutes of Gaius and Justinian"; and, had the author been able to confine himself within these limits, his accuracy and clearness and the utility of his book might have been questioned, but criticism of his method would hardly have been appropriate. As it is, the book falls between two stools. It is not a simple digest of the Institutes, nor is it a proper critical treatment of the subject. Thus the author does not confine himself, on the historical side, to those changes which make the difference between the law of Gaius and the law of Justinian, but gives some account of the origin and development of most of the institutions with which he deals. We could wish that, having gone thus far, he had gone further. The value and interest of Roman Law to the modern student are becoming more and more historical. The author is as good a judge as any one of the utility of his work for the purposes of the Oxford Schools, but we suspect he has been thinking chiefly of his weaker pupils. Surely the better class requires something at once more comprehensive and critical.

No better example of what we mean could be found than the section on contract. A simple statement of the contents of the Institutes would have been harmless and useless. Mr. Leage states theories of the origin of stipulatio and mutuum, and hints views upon the bonae fidei contracts, but makes no attempt to view the subject as a whole, to show how the gulf between contract under the Twelve Tables and under the Corpus Juris was bridged. Again, the whole interest of the Perpetua Mulierum Tutela lies in its decay, of the system of Delicts in its strong flavour of archaism. These are topics upon which the book touches, but without real grasp or illumination.

We believe these faults to be due partly to the fact that the author is content to follow, in the main, the order of the Institutes. It is a pity, in any case, not to show the student a better way than one which results in two separated sections on Exceptiones, Agency figuring as part of the law relating to actions, and Universal Succession occupying a wholly unjustifiable position. But beyond this, the order makes a comprehensive and critical treatment almost impossible: it spoils the attempt to make the book a little more than an analysis.

One merit the book certainly has; it is very clearly and concisely written, except where, as is occasionally inevitable, conciseness gets the better of clearness. We wish we could add the merit of accuracy, for then the author might retort that our previous criticisms are inappropriate for a book professedly elementary. But we note with regret a number of mistakes some of which might certainly have been avoided by more careful revision. We will mention the more obvious.

Gaius does not say that the legislative power of the Senate was questioned under the Republic, for such power was not then claimed for the Senate; and it is giving a very wrong impression to say that "by the time of Augustus the auctoritas of the Senate had come to be regarded as essential for every law" (pp. 9 and 10). We do not think there is any authority for the statement—so opposed to principle—that the children of a Latinus Junianus were full citizens, unless, perhaps, in the later Empire. On p. 80 we find it said that in the time of Gaius a father on emancipating a filius retained absolutely one-third of the peculium adventitium (more correctly bona adventitia), which the previous page has rightly told us only arose under Constantine. The exact title of the bona-fide possessor to fructus is not easily explained, but the account, on p. 130 seems to us confused, not to say wrong. Again, it was from the edict, not the jus civile that came the requirement that the number of witnesses to a will should be seven (Just. ii. 10, 3, and p. 177), though this is a trifle.

The most serious mistakes occur in the section on contracts. One might as well call stipulatio a consensual contract as nexum a real contract (p. 265). The condictio triticaria did not enable an additional third to be recovered by way of penalty (p. 267 and elsewhere). The account of the written stipulatio (p. 273) raises suspicions which are confirmed on turning to p. 291, where we are told that a person sued upon a cautio, which raised a presumption of a proper stipulation, could rebut that presumption by showing that no stipulation had in fact been made. The author seems to us to misunderstand and exaggerate the passage of Ulpian (Dig. 2. 14. 7. 12), and to overlook the significance of Just. iii. 19. 12 and other texts. One would hardly gather from him that the mere fact that a stipulation had not really been made might very well furnish no defence to an action on the cautio. There is mention of the second chapter of the Lex Aquilia neither on p. 282 nor p. 330 nor elsewhere. The statement made on p. 287, that nomina transcripticia were the only cases of obligatio literis, is tenable, but is contradicted on p. 290. The attempt made on p. 292 to import the doctrine of consideration into the consensual contracts is a bad blunder. Certain contracts were allowed to be binding by simple consent, but no common principle underlies these exceptions; a doctrine of quid pro quo must have had far wider consequences. Besides, the author sees that no such doctrine will apply to mandatum, in spite of his remark (p. 304, clearly erroneous) that from the moment of the formation of the contract the mandatarius had the actio mandati contraria. The author must know that there can be a good equitable assignment of contractual rights in this country without writing, though the contrary seems to be stated at p. 315. Only confusion can come from the attempt (p. 317) to apply the notion of contrarius actus to the real contracts. Release of literal obligations by accepti relatio is only a highly probable conjecture.

There seem to be no notable mistakes in the section on delicts. With regard to Part III. (Actions) we must advert to the supposed formula of an actio venditi on p. 369, which is at variance with the principles governing the drafting of the intentio in a bonae fidei actio (see p. 386).

In conclusion it is a pleasure to say that many of the sections show considerable power of lucid exposition, notably that on servitudes, and again that on legacies and that on dos. There is a very good summary of the slave's position in the matter of contract. But it is a pity that an elementary work should contain so many mistakes, and it is not altogether desirable that a work, professedly of that particular character, should now and again, and on no apparent principle, give a cursory account of what requires deeper treatment.

THE CATHOLIC RENAISSANCE

La Renaissance Catholique en Angleterre au XIX^e Siècle. Troisième Partie. De la Mort de Wiseman à la Mort de Manning, 1865-1892. Par PAUL THUREAU-DANGIN, de l'Académie Française. (Paris: Plon, 7 fr. 50.)

THIS volume is the conclusion of M. Thureau-Dangin's history of the Catholic revival in this country, in which term he includes the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church of England. Those who have read the two previous volumes will not need to be told that the author shows a knowledge of the subject, and—what is still more rare—a sympathetic appreciation of the English point of view such as is rarely shown by those who write about a foreign country. This book is one which Englishmen should read; the view of an intelligent foreigner is always interesting, and the view of a foreigner so thoroughly competent and well informed as M. Thureau-Dangin is very valuable. There is certainly no English book which gives a more just and clear account of the Oxford Movement and its effects on the two Churches, and there are very few which can be compared with this either for interest or for information.

M. Thureau-Dangin possesses in a marked degree the essential qualities of an historian. He makes no pretence to an impartiality that is equivalent to indifference and leads to dulness and misunderstanding; but his statements of fact are never coloured in the smallest degree, his candour is perfect, he never suppresses anything for reasons of "edification," and his judgment is of rare quality. In this volume he has to deal with the delicate subject of the relations between Manning and Newman; that his sympathies are with the latter is evident, but he is entirely just to both, and the story has never been told with such perfect balance and sense of proportion. In spite of the author's admiration of Newman, he makes his special failing apparent merely by his scrupulously accurate presentation of the facts. That failing was a capacity for getting other people into positions from which he could not help them to find their way out. Newman was always encouraging or half-encouraging people to take a certain course, but, when it came to the point, was apt almost to leave them in the lurch. He ought not, for instance, to have refused Dugasbury's offer to take him as his theologian to the Vatican Council; his view of the case is clearly shown in his letter to Bishop Ullathorne and in other private letters, and he ought not to have shrunk from taking an active part. In all probability Newman would never have become a Roman Catholic had he not put himself and others in an untenable position by starting his theory of the Via Media without making himself really acquainted with the Anglican Divines.

M. Thureau-Dangin brings out more clearly even than Mr. Purcell the greatness of the last years of Manning's life, although he has not perhaps much more sympathy than Mr. Purcell with the political and economic standpoint at which Manning arrived, one not very different from that of the French Radical-Socialists. The late Mr. Henry George, by the way, though an apostle of land nationalisation, was certainly neither a Socialist nor an opponent of private property in general, and Manning quite understood and sympathised with his views. The complete change in Manning's ecclesiastical and religious views is also made plain by the author, and his explanation is, no doubt, the true one. Manning was an Ultramontane so long as the fervour of the convert lasted; the change was due to knowledge and experience. It was even greater than M. Thureau-Dangin perhaps realises; Manning, in his later years, came to regard the breakdown of the papal system in its present form as almost inevitable; he was thoroughly disillusioned.

The last four chapters of the volume deal particularly with the movement in the Church of England, and here in particular the author shows his ability to appreciate and understand a point of view not his own. It must be admitted that this part of the volume is less interesting to an English reader than the other; the tale of ritual persecutions has often been told, and was never of absorbing interest. But it gives the French reader an accurate account of the event, though, perhaps, it will tend to give him an exaggerated notion of the relative importance of the Anglo-Catholic party in the English Church. Since M. Thureau-Dangin is writing a history of that party, not of the Church of England as a whole, this is almost inevitable: but he is not altogether just to the Broad Churchmen in the references that he makes to them. He does not attempt to forecast the future, but evidently thinks that the Church of England will break up and that the Anglo-Catholic may eventually join the Roman Communion. There does not seem to be much probability of either contingency; it may, indeed, be asked whether the Anglo-Catholic movement in the Church of England has not passed its zenith. The Roman Catholic revival certainly passed it long since.

A LITTLE SONG FOR ST. CLARE

If I might be
A blade of grass, a flower beside the way,
To touch the hem of Francis' robe each day—
Ah, joy too sweet for me!

If I might know
The bliss the wind has for a little while
Which breathes soft kisses on his lips that smile—
God will not have it so!

SEA SONGS AND BALLADS

IN these days of short voyages and pirated music the popular sea-song is rarely heard; a few old ballads, a few traditional chanties survive among a mass of very quaint modern tackle, the paradoxical humour of which is its most noticeable feature. "The Golden Vanity" in a corrupt form or "Farewell and adieu to ye gay Spanish ladies"—what a splendid line and how lamentably followed!—may still be heard; and among modern chanties "What's to do with a drunken sailor" and the rest of them, emanating, it is said, from 'Frisco, deserve the attention of the curious. But who can have written "Officers' Wives" or "Keel Haul"? What freakish mood inspired:

It was twenty-seven bells by the Waterbury watch,
Yeho, my lads, yeho!
The skipper was full of good old Scotch,
And the crew had gone below—ow—ow,
Yeho, my lads, yeho!

with its romantic MacGenty (Jonah) episode of the Brobdingnagian whale? Typical of this amazing form of humour is "The Blue-haired little Boy," which begins thus:

He has gone from us for ever has our blue-haired little boy,
We will never see our cross-eyed darling more:
Like a dream he passed away on the ninety-third of May,
He never died so suddenly before.
No more upon the mat will he play with pussy cat,
No more between his teeth he'll squeeze its tail,
No more upon the red hot bars he'll rub its little nose,
For little brother Tommy's kicked the pail.

Chorus:

He has gone for evermore at the age of ninety-four,
And there's nothing in the world his life would save.
So I'm off to the asylum to fulfil his last request
And to plant a bunch of tombstones on his grave.

Quousque tandem? These songs are possibly preferable to Dibdin's pensioned doggerel, but it is not surprising to hear that the most popular songs in the Navy of to-day are the latest music-hall trifles and such ballads as the Songs of the Sea which Mr. Newbolt wrote and Sir Charles Stanford set to music.

Most great poets have written about the sea, no one better than Beowulf; yet few have written songs which sailors can sing. That is left for the second-rate versifiers, the Deloneys and the Dibdins. Naval ballads of the nineteenth century can be written on half a sheet of note-paper; Browning's "Hervé Riel," Tennyson's "Revenge," Cory's "Two Captains," Stevenson's "Christmas at Sea," Henley's borrowed "O Falmouth is a fine town," Kipling, Newbolt and a few more—and after that it is a matter for research. Besides, they are for the great part literary imitations of the old ballads and sea-songs. To get back to the genuine contemporary broadside, half news-letter, half poem, is like passing from Southsea to the old quarter of Portsmouth. Sometimes it is an account of a sea-fight, bald and bombastic, rescued from insignificance only by its black letter and wood-cuts; sometimes an incredible romance, recorded with humble sentimentality and giving the impression that nothing could be commoner than for maidens to join their sailor lovers in disguise and either to be shot in the breast or else discovered, pardoned, and married with acclamations. These are parallel to the broadsides which deal with landsmen and relate events or romances in the counties, strange births or bold highway-men, or fables about Robin Hood or rough treatment of the Devil. There is endless entertainment for the indolent reader who can go to the originals; but a glance through any of the reprinted ballads—Roxburgh or Bagford or Halliwell's Naval Ballads or Ashton's Real Sea-songs—will show that only a few of them can survive small print and the commentator's accretions. Many, too, are as delightful and as unprintable as Dufey's "Pills to Purge Melancholy." What, for instance, could be more inspiring than the first stanza of "The Seaman's Frolic; or, A Cooler for the Captain"?

Captain Robert is gone to sea
(And I loved him well and I loved him well,
With all his merry, merry company
(Ther's them can sing and say).
Captain Robert is gone to sea,
The girls for his return doth pray,
And we shall never, never, while we live, come no more there
And we shall never . . .

The reason for this reluctance to revisit the same port may be ascertained by the inquisitive; also the happy issue of that touching ballad, "Joy after Sorrow, being the Seaman's return from Jamaica," of the Maid which fell in desperation;

She loved a young man passing well,
Which brought her in vexation.

Rollicking, warm-hearted songs they are, regardless of probability and of length. Forlorn maidens wander sighing by the willows and the river, when suddenly the lost hero leaps ashore from his ship, pretending, perhaps, that he is the messenger of his own death at sea; or, if a morbid perverseness has afflicted the poet, his corpse is flung ashore at her feet and she dies of the shock. Villainous perfidy is treated with no less inevitable moralisation than unerring fidelity, and with equal prolixity; fifty stanzas is a common allowance for the description of a tortuous romance. The titles are alluring: "The Gosport Tragedy, or the Perjured Ship Carpenter," "The Seaman's Adieu to his pretty Betty, living near Wapping," "Love and Loyalty, a letter from a Young Man, on board of an English Privateer, to his beloved Susan in the City of London," "The Saylor's Complaint, or the True Character of the Purser of a Ship" (raciest of indictments) titillate the fancy, and, as often as not, prove to be misleading.

To be quite frank, there is no great harvest for the inquirer after beauty and poetry in these fields; but the laborious gleaner will be rewarded. Ashton, among a hundred and thirty "Real Sea Songs," has recovered several charming ballads.

Fisher lads go to the fishing,
Bonny lasses to the braes,
Fisher lads come home at even,
Tell how their fishing gaes, sings one maiden whose lover is "away at Greenland." And another, writing her song and at every line "dropping a tear, Crying alas! for Billy my dear," says:

Thousands, thousands all in a room,
My love he carries the brightest bloom,
He surely is some chosen one,
I will have him, or else have none.

The grass doth grow on every lea,
The leaf doth fall from every tree,
How happy that small bird doth cry,
That her true love doth by her lie.

The colour of amber is my true love's hair,
His red rosy cheeks doth my heart ensnare,
His ruby lips are soft, and with charms,
I'd fain lay a night in his lovely arms.

The poem ends tragically, unlike "The Welcome Sailor" where the maiden declares:

My heart is like the sea, ever in motion.

Evidently a poetical lady; for when he unexpectedly returned:

They both sat down and sung, but she sung clearest,
Like a nightingale in spring, Welcome home, my dearest.

This ballad, by the way, is only a later version of "The Valiant Seaman's Return," beginning "When Sol did cast no light"; and it is not uncommon to find considerable variations in different versions, as for instance in the development of "Sir Walter Raleigh sailing in the Low Lands," into the Scotch "Golden Vanity" which "Christopher North" used to sing.

Naturally, the historical ballads admit of less variation in transmission, with their occasionally spirited but usually pedestrian accounts of recent sea-fights. But they are too much of the nature of semi-official reports and, in point of interest, must give way to the romantic tales of famous pirates, of Captain Webb and the Rainbow and of Dansekarr the Dutchman, and, finest by far, of Sir Andrew Barton. Lord Howard's marksmen brought down all those whom this bold pirate sent up the mast-tree "to let the beams fall," and at last Sir Andrew, encased in armour, climbed up himself, and Horsly, the "bowman rare" from Yorkshire, shot in vain:

Then Horsly spied a privie place, with a perfect eye in a secret part,
His arrow swiftly flew apace,
and smote Sir Andrew to the heart.
Fight on, fight on, my merry men all,
a little I am hurt yet not slaine,
I'll but lie downe and bleed awhile,
and come and fight with you againe.

And do not, saith he, feare English Rogues and of your Foes stand in no awe,
But stand fast by S. Andrewes crosse, untill you heare my whistle blow.
They never heard his whistle blow which made them all full sore afraid:
Then Horsly said, my Lord aboard, for now Sir Andrew Bartons dead.

A noble pirate and a noble singer, and we are within hailing distance of Sir Patrick Spens. Mr. Wright, in the Festive Songs which he collected for the Percy Society, includes an early pirates' song from an old comedy, published about 1570.

Lustely, lustely, lustely let us saile forthe,
The winde trim doth serve us, it blowes from the north.
All things we have ready, and nothing we want
To furnish our ship that rideth hereby;
Victals and weapons thei be nothing skant,
Like worthie mariners ourselves we will trie.

So it begins, and ends with splendid optimism:

If fortune then faile not, and our next volage prove,
Wee will returne merely and make good cheere,
And hold all together as friends linkt in love,
The cannes shall be filled with wine, ale and beere.

Several of the earliest songs are in praise of the sea-faring life; Halliwell in his Naval Ballads (Percy Society), quotes two poems which express the pro and the con., the "Hope of Good Fortune," and "Evill Fortune" of "seafardingers;" and "The Praise of Saylor," parent of numerous ballads, with its ingenuous opening:

As I lay musing in my bed,
full warm and well at ease,
I thought upon the lodgings hard poor sailors had at seas, is well answered by a later broadside entitled "Cordial Advice to all rash young Men who think to advance their decaying Fortunes by Navigation," which also begins with spirit.

You merchaat men of Billingsgate,
I wonder how you can thrive,
You bargain with men for six months,
and pay them but for five:

But so long as the water runs under the bridge, and the tide doth ebb and flow,
I'll no more to Greenland sail, no, no, no.

The description of "bisket" boiled in whale-oil, "a] to increase our woe," of brutal punishments, of storms and the risk of being "intombed by some vast whale," and of the cure for faintness (which would horrify Chicago), must have deterred many adventurous spirits from a voyage to Greenland. And even the earliest sea-song known, which tells of a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. James at Compostella, is a gruesome catalogue of discomforts. The first stanza is grim enough:

Men may leve all gamys,
That saylen to Seynt Jamys;
For many a man hit gramys [upsets]
When they begyn to sayle;

and the last equally depressing:

For when that we shall go to bedde,
The pumps was nygh our bedde hede,
A man were as good to be dede,
As smell thereof the styngk.

It would be well to leave the subject on some less plaintive note, and to remember that the miseries of the seafarer were only one side of his life, and lessened as time went on. "The Sailor's Onely Delight" strikes a larger chord with its tale of the George Aloe and the Sweepstake; and there is even a note of pity after the Frenchman had been thrown into the sea.

Lord how it grieves our hearts full soré, with hey, with hee, for and anony ho,
To see the drown'd Frenchmen swim along the shore, and alongst the coast of Barvante.

All through these black-letter ballads there is the same homely touch, even in the most conventional dialogues between sailors and their sweethearts; they are one and all "human documents" and well repay a cursory examination. They are vigorous, honest and often romantic; but the impression which they leave is of sailors dreaming of home, fighting for home, and sailing home.

I stand on deck, my dearie, and in my fancy see,
The faces of the loved ones that smile across the sea;
Yes, the faces of the loved ones, but 'midst them all so clear,
I see the one I love the best—your bonnie face, my dear.
And it's hame, dearie, hame! oh it's hame I want to be,
My topsails are hoisted, and I must out to sea;
For the oak and the ash and the bonny birchen tree,
They're all agrowin' green in the North-a-countree.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE ENGLISH SONNET

Most people if asked to define a sonnet would be able to give only the rough description: "a poem of fourteen lines." Except the few students of sonnets there are not many who realise the limitations and perfections of which the sonnet is capable. Its emotion, its idea, its enthusiasm, must be limited within the compass of these fourteen lines, and what is more, the idea must be born, matured and fade away in this short space. A very handsomely bound book, issued from the Wellwood Press, called "A Book of English Sonnets," has given rise to several reflections anent the duties of sonneteers. It would seem that a writer of no great merit can sometimes concentrate his talent in this direction, if he use all the depth and sincerity of which his nature is capable. With careful study of the rules and a deep study of the spirit that governs the best sonnets, a readable sonnet with the light of poetry about it may be written. But a journalist can spend a day in the country and read Jefferies coming home at night, and next day The Sunbeam may contain a very tolerable shadow of the "Pageant of Summer." Of course, a man may write one song that will survive to glorify his name, so it is possible that a man may write much unvalued verse, but leave the one great thought or emotion of a lifetime in a tiny sonnet. We may recall the name of Blanco White, forgotten now, save by a few who, searching among collections of sonnets, will find sometimes that piece of vivid imaginativeness called "Night." It is not included in this present book, but the compiler in his preface says "that this anthology has no claim to be other than a personal choice, nor does it aim at an impossible completeness." However, he says further on that he has wished to include nothing that is not of the best nor does he wish to stick to any "rigid, formal theory" of the sonnet. The compiler lays himself open to criticism when he claims that he has lifted the best in the first instance; in the second, a gardener who declares that he reproduces the trim and ordered pleasaunce of the eighteenth century and yet, with the "return to nature" mind of the twentieth century, will allow wild corners and luxuriant masses of flowers, has achieved nothing. A sonnet is not an ode, it is not an indeterminate length of ecstasy, or reproach, or lovers' pleading such as come under the name of Thomas Watson in this collection. Among others, we quote with regret one by Charles Lamb as an instance of how fourteen lines of verse, because they happen to be fourteen, and for no other reason that we can imagine except that they were perpetrated by genius in an unlucky hour, are handed to the unsuspecting aspirant to literature as an example of the form and spirit of the sonnet:

In Christian world Mary the garland wears!
Rebecca sweetens on a Hebrew's ear;
Quakers for pure Priscilla are more clear;
And the light Gaul by amorous Ninon swears;
Among the lesser lights how Lucy shines!
What air of fragrance Rosamond throws round!
How like a hymn doth sweet Cecilia sound!
Of Marthas, and of Abigails, few lines
Have bragged in verse. Of coarsest household stuff Should homely Joan be fashioned. But can You Barbara resist, or Marian?
And is not Clare for love excuse enough?
Yet by my faith in numbers, I profess
These all than Saxon Edith please me less.

If the compiler really wished to include the laughter and love of ladies' names he should have quoted Henley's Ballade on that subject. We think the following might be as suitable as an example of what a sonnet should not be:

Sentiment hallows the vowels of Delia;
Sweet simplicity breathes from Rose;
Courtly memories glitter in Celia;
Rosalind savours of quips and hose,
Araminta of wits and beaux,
Prue of puddings, and Coralie
All of sawdust and spangled shows;
Anna's the name of names for me.

In looking over what might be called the best we turn naturally to Shakespeare to seek in the magic mirror of his sonnets the saddest secrets of his heart, and what we believe to be the most perfect expression of himself. Most of the finest are quoted; but why include out of thirteen that one beginning:

The expense of spirit in a waste of shame,
and,
What potions have I drunk of siren tears.

There are two in their stead which the lover of literature might have prayed for:

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day,
and,
When I have seen by Time's fell hand defaced.

It is an error in literary taste which is not covered by the plea of personal choice. There are, however, many sonnets we have not met before which the curious lover of sonnets may be glad to meet with. But the majority and all the best will be found in William Sharp's little book, "Sonnets of the Century."

Such an omnium gatherum leads to a very particular consideration of this form of poetry. To enumerate a few points by description may not be here out of place. First, the workmanship must be thorough, second, the inspiration throughout must be unforced. There is no other form of literary composition where the thought must be so perfectly defined in so short a space, and moreover defined in a manner that in most cases is fixed. The beginning must be eloquent with the thought, the middle contain the enlargement or generalisation, and the concluding lines either die away with the finished thought or take a decisive farewell of the emotion summoned up. We will use first an example from Keats, who loved the sonnet. His Odes seem in spirit almost a series of sonnets. His genius had largely that note of passionate self-revelation which must ever go along with the great body of sonnet literature—"with that small key Shakespeare unlocked his heart." Shrouded in a man's writings are the aspirations and despairs of his personal life. The wise read them, here a word and there a word.

But the sonnet was born by a union of the desire of the heart and the unrest of the brain chained within those fourteen lines, screened by a severe art from the careless eye; there lies the history of hearts. The greatest sequences of sonnets have always been those that alternately touched on or wanted with, that embroidered on or renounced, great and desolate passions. There are, of course, sonnets, especially where a man, otherwise unknown, has written a single one of note, which deal with some independent subject that has stirred a need of fervent utterance. Among great sonnets, albeit he touched that magic string but seldom, Milton's stand alone. They mostly deal with the less personal themes, although those On His Blindness, His Dead Wife and his Twenty-third Birthday have the anguish and the aspiration of a soul's deepest life. We will take one of Keats's less well-known sonnets to trace in a small degree its creation.

When I have fears that I may cease to be
Before my pen has glean'd my teeming brain,
Before high-piled books, in charact'ry
Hold like rich garners the full-ripen'd grain;
When I behold, upon the night's starr'd face,
Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance,
And think that I may never live to trace
Their shadows, with the magic hand of chance;

And when I feel, fair Creature of an hour!
That I shall never look upon thee more,
Never have relish in the faery power
Of unreflecting love—then on the shore
Of the wide world I stand alone, and think Till Love and Fame to nothingness do sink.

It is not one of his great sonnets, yet it has all his promise and power, something of the tears and sweetness of his magic lines.

The first line introduces the subject in completeness. The next seven lines give the reason of it, with gradual intensification of intellectual pain. It finishes, and a parallel emotion arises, and he follows it to the helpless close of love till the poem fades away in the gloom of the original thought. Shakespeare shows us that peculiar quality where the thought is evoked, searched into and compared, and finally divided into nothingness. The sonnet was his consolation. The thought came, was analysed, made poetry of, and flung aside:

When, in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless cries,
And look upon myself and curse my fate;
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured like him, like him with friends possess'd,
Desiring this man's art and that man's scope,
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply I think on thee—and then my state,
Like to the lark at break of day arising
From sullen earth, sings hymns at heaven's gate:
For thy sweet love remember'd such wealth brings
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

There is the history of a thought, a beginning, the middle and the declension. For an eloquent expression of one emotion we will close with Wordsworth's tenderest sonnet:

Surprised by joy—impatient as the Wind—
I turn to share the transport—Oh! with whom
But Thee, deep buried in the silent tomb,
That spot which no vicissitude can find?
Love, faithful love, recalled thee to my mind—
But how could I forget thee? Through what power
Even for the least division of an hour,
Have I been so beguiled as to be blind
To my most grievous loss!—That thought's return
Was the worst pang that sorrow ever bore,
Save one, one only, when I stood forlorn,
Knowing my heart's best treasure was no more;
That neither present time, nor years unborn
Could to my sight that heavenly face restore.

FICTION

The Guarded Flame. By W. B. MAXWELL. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. MAXWELL possesses the gift of concentration to an almost dangerous extent. In "Vivien" he directed his attention to blouse-shops and drapery establishments with an ardour which lent photographic accuracy to his portrayal of life therein. In "The Guarded Flame" he is occupied entirely with a small household in a quiet south-coast town. The chief member of this household is a very great scientist, which makes it necessary that there should be much talk of science in the book. It is here that Mr. Maxwell's concentration becomes dangerous. The terminology of blouse-shops is fairly easy to master; but the average person does not wish to buy a scientific dictionary to read a novel with, and Mr. Maxwell's intense interest in his theme leads him to forget that there is a large section of the public which does not know what a cerebrum is, and that it will agree too fully with him that "the diagnosis was not clear" when that diagnosis varied between "an embolism and vascular occlusion." This obscurity is all the more annoying because of the intense interest of the book. It is like cheating us out of a thrilling passage, or what we guess may be a thrilling passage, by writing it in a foreign tongue. The author's achievement is all the greater in that his personages and his incidents are not of the newest. The old man whose young wife and secretary fall in love with each other are not new to fiction; Dickens foreshadowed them in his Dr. Strong and Annie. But the fine character of Richard Burgoyne, his charming disposition, and his quiet, sunny home-life hold the reader's attention from the first page. His achievements are unintelligible to the general, it is true, but Mr. Maxwell tells us intelligibly that they were great, and this explains the care with which "the guarded flame" of his long life is cherished by those around him. There is no member of the little household who does not sacrifice his or herself to the great man, who is also very lovable. But another flame creeps in, fierce and not to be withstood, and the sunny atmosphere of the book slowly changes, subtly, and with an ever-increasing sense of coming sorrow. The illicit love that is so natural in the young wife who has never really lived, brings a terrible punishment; the great brain is clouded, a young life is cut short, her own and her lover's are thrust into a horrible welter of shame and pain and enforced secrecy. It is all astoundingly clever, and the long processes of thought, scarcely strengthened by any action, are never for an instant tedious. When the climax comes, and the husband, in a scene of power and horror, discovers his wrong, it would have been fatally easy for Mr. Maxwell to spoil his work; but he did not. The expiation is long, and Sybil throughout recalls the little mermaid who trod on knives at every step; but gradually the clouds lighten. There is nothing obvious about the ending; the husband does not die, and the lover's death reaches us, as it reaches Sybil, from a long way off. But in the evening there is light, and our last glimpse of husband and wife is so peaceful, and so quiet, that its poignancy is haunting. Mr. Maxwell has a quiet and very refreshing humour, which brightens his pages. He has allowed himself the trick of occasionally relating events in the present tense, and the scientific terminology is a defect. But, when all is said, "The Guarded Flame" is an enthralling study of character by an earnest and sympathetic student. In dignity of subject and treatment it is a great advance upon "Vivien," though it will probably not be so popular. It has but little action, and the hero is an old man—quite enough to frighten the circulating libraries without the aid of vascular occlusion. But it is profoundly human and profoundly moving; and—to comfort the libraries—there is one whispered scene in it which, read even in the broad glare of a summer afternoon, completely terrified us.

The House of Souls. By ARTHUR MACHEN. (Grant Richards, 6s.)

IF a man has a turn for carving gurgoyles one cannot fairly blame him for failing to produce pet lambs. We should be the last to dispute such a sound canon of criticism and have thoroughly enjoyed the brisk yet subtle shower of satire in which Mr. Machen descends (in the preface to this collection of fantastic tales) upon the shoulders of those who demand a pet lamb, as a serious, moral rallying point, and a profitable asset to boot, in the corner of every work of fiction. For all that, we cannot help feeling that he has put powers of imagination, on which he justly prides himself, to somewhat sinister uses. He is, in fact, more often than not obsessed by the gurgoylesque. He speaks somewhere of ages in which man lived in a world of mystery and love and adoration, when sacraments stood about all his ways, when the veil of the Temple grew there before his gaze and he saw the great sacrifice offered in the Holy Place: yet the atmosphere of the tales themselves is, except in one instance, wholly different, and the sacrifices therein are offered in most unholy places. If "almost every page contains a hint (under varied images and symbols) of a belief in a world that is not of ordinary every-day experience, that in a measure transcends the experience of Bethel and the Bank," one is left with the impression that the world behind the veil, as dimly imagined here, is indescribably hideous and appalling. We have every appreciation of good, hideous, ingenious gurgoyles (to keep up the metaphor) in their proper place, but Mr. Machen, like the famous wight who:

Thought he saw a banker's clerk Descending from a 'bus;

but:

Looked again and saw it was
A hippopotamus, might presumably mistake some innocent lily or rose, seen in a dusken fantasy, for a hobgoblin, or the King of the Fairies for Beelzebub. The particular mark at which this criticism is directed is the mystical tale called "The White People." This story, which is inset into a not particularly well-executed discussion on the nature and spiritual significance of sin, contains the narrative of a young girl, who as a child had lit somehow upon some of the secrets of Fairyland and whose initiation gradually widened as she grew. The thing is not wanting either in imagination or in a certain painful beauty of its own. It is, perhaps, the best-written piece in the book, and the childish, simple language, admirably suggested and maintained, heightens its undeniable pathos. But in the end the young girl is found dead, self-poisoned in time—whatever that may mean—and prostrate before an image which we are given vaguely to understand is symbolic of the "monstrous mythology of the (witches') Sabbath." We cannot satisfactorily follow the process by which this gruesome consummation is attained. Mr. Machen has been inspired, no doubt, by wild, weird places. Their anciently reported spells, as Emerson has it, have crept upon him, but nowhere here does the enchantment of nature make for sober healing. And why should these influences be set to work upon a pure young spirit for sorcery rather than for sanctification? If Mr. Machen should answer: Why not? we can only say how very greatly we should prefer the alternative. The other experiments with the "gurgoylesque" are at least legitimate. Weird and resourceful as they are, however, perhaps they rather fail of horror in their super-psychical parts. Nothing elsewhere in "The Great God Pan" approaches the effect produced upon the reader by the callousness of the experiment of the doctor (in the preliminary chapter) upon the brain of the girl who had once owed her life to him, and that incident is nearer to the possibilities of a lust for science than any part of the resulting coil, in which the devil became incarnate for a while and was made woman. In neither this nor the clever arabesque entitled "The Three Impostors" (which might well have been called "The Murderers' Fantasia") is the elaborate surrounding scroll-work quite as effective as it might be; and in the latter extravaganza we lose touch with the main event through the plethora of side tales with which it is garnished, though a word of praise is due to the various literary and artistic characters upon whose vagaries and idiosyncrasies the action indirectly hinges. In our view, Mr. Machen displays a more pleasing fancy in "A Fragment of Life" which opens the collection. Herein are revealed a city clerk and his wife immured by a most sad wizardry within wall after seemingly impregnable wall of commonplace environment. But at the heart of the man is a sealed fountain of poetry and imagination. Touched by a chance association, the fountain bursts—the crumbling of those barriers may well leave the dusty reader refreshed.

The Eglamore Portraits. By MARY E. MANN. (Methuen, 6s.)

MRS. MANN owes nothing to her plot for the success of "The Eglamore Portraits." The book holds our attention from the very beginning, by reason of the intensely human types with which we are brought into contact and the skilful and unexaggerated manner in which the author handles her characters and their doings. The story hinges upon a subject that has long ago been worn threadbare. The principal object of mirth in the days of John Leech and the early Punches, it has since run the gamut of the literary scale and is now usually associated with the comic half-penny press. The tyranny of the mother-in-law is a theme which few modern novelists would care to elaborate, but Mrs. Mann approaches it in all seriousness. In a simple and direct style that eliminates the vulgar jocularity with which, in obedience to tradition, the subject is generally treated, she lays before us the struggles of a young couple harassed with an exceptionally disagreeable and domineering specimen of the maligned class. The young couple are of an ordinary, middle-class type; the scene is laid in a humdrum country town, varied by a glimpse of a rich merchant's house near Birmingham; the story deals with the usual foolish quarrels and reconciliations of a hot-tempered young wife and a stubborn husband; the "Eglamore Portraits," the cause, in conjunction with the step-mother, of all the strife, are a couple of pictures by a Victorian artist, painted in "his earlier manner"; but, in spite of all this apparent mediocrity, there is not a dull page in the book. We follow with interest the career of the silly, flighty little wife, torn between her love for her husband and her dread of her mother, and the patient, though determined, young husband has our full sympathy. Mrs. Mann has been particularly happy, both in her delineation of the latter and of a certain Susy Plain, a masculine young woman, whose loud voice, breezy manner and copious use of slang successfully cover the fact that she is a busybody of the most pronounced order. The tragic element is not wanting in the closing chapters of the book, but we leave the young couple reconciled and in each other's arms.

The Brangwyn Mystery. By DAVID CHRISTIE MURRAY. (Long, 6s.)

THIS is a good-tempered "murder" story with a strong central situation. The practised novel reader will know at once what sort of story to expect, and will take it with him in a boat on a summer's day. When he has had lunch and moored his boat in a shady place he will read "The Brangwyn Mystery" and find all he asks of a novel in such circumstances, a lovely heroine, a suffering hero, plentiful comic relief, a stolid English detective, Frenchmen who speak broken English and an undiscovered murder that the reader, to set him quite at ease, is allowed to discover before he arrives at the sixtieth page. The dramatic possibilities of the situation are never reached, never could be reached by treatment so light and characters so sketchy: but they are there for the master hand. What is a man to do if he is generally suspected of a murder, but not officially prosecuted: and if he can only clear himself by sending his kinsman to the scaffold? The bare statement of the problem points to tragic depths: terrors that would jar on the holiday mood. Mr. Murray keeps them at arm's length, and is chiefly intent on engaging our sympathies for an habitual drunkard. In this he is entirely successful. It is impossible not to like Billery and rejoice whenever he is on the stage, even if we are sceptical about his easy conversion. We do not grudge him his delightful Irish wife, but we hope she kept the key of the Tantalus.

FINE ART

NATIONAL COMPETITION EXHIBITION AT SOUTH KENSINGTON

I WONDER whether the high standard of much of the work of these students from all England, the enormous number of things sent up for examination, the ten gold medals, fifty-nine silver medals, two hundred and ten bronze medals, three hundred and eighty-two prizes of books, and five hundred and nineteen commendations which were awarded are matters of congratulation. We think of Cousin Pons and Balzac's profound remarks on his fate:

Il montrait gratis une des nombreuses victimes du fatal et funeste système nommé Concours, qui regne encore en France après cent ans de pratique sans résultat . . . Que penseriez-vous des Egyptiens, qui, dit-on, inventèrent des fours pour faire éclore des poulets, s'ils n'eussent point immédiatement donné la becquée à ces mêmes poulets? Ainsi se comporte cependant la France qui tâche de produire des artistes par la serre chaude du Concours: et, une fois la statuaire, le peintre, le graveur, le musicien obtenus par ce procédé mécanique, elle ne s'en inquiète pas plus que le dandy ne se soucie le soir des fleurs qu'il a mises à sa boutonnière.

What becomes of these gold medallists, bronze medallists commended students? Some hold it as an axiom that the prize winners of the schools never become really eminent as artists, though they may be popular; yet the fact that the Prix de Rome men in music during thirty years have proved their excellence, whilst in painting and sculpture they have nearly always turned out nonentities, is a singular contradiction of Balzac's complaint.

However this may be, there is one matter for congratulation, the great preponderance of works in the applied arts. Chairs and tables, teapots, card-cases, torpedo-boat-destroyers, baptism services and lace collarettes we must have, and we might as well have them designed well and truly, by trained eyes and cunning hands. Pictures, in oil or water-colour, are apparently not a necessary of life, and those to whom they are a luxury that can be indulged fill in their houses with works by painters who can no longer profit by their patronage, being dead. And so the comparative scarcity of students of painting pure and simple is quite what it should be.

Even in this class the examiners, perhaps wisely, show great severity. It would be indiscreet to mention the names of students, so I will only say that one study in oil of the nude was only thought worthy of a bronze medal, because :

the examiners wish to remark that life studies should be painted in a more simple and direct method.

Perfection such as is shown in this piece is to be deprecated. It would puzzle the examiners to produce anything as sound and scholarly themselves by any method, direct or indirect. Another first-rate piece of work only obtained a bronze medal, and the reason given is quite baffling :

They again regret to find that objects with much intricacy of detail are used, such as curtains with patterns, repoussé brass work, books with type, sheets of music, etc., which are not suited to the study of Still Life painting, as they afford little play for the artistic preception [sic] of the student.

Any artist who is not an examiner would imagine that success in combining finish of detail and breadth of vision as in this group of old books is the highest achievement in mere craftsmanship, and that "artistic perception" is quite out of place in studies of still life. On the other hand, there is too much of this "beavers' labour" in places where it is inappropriate, in designs for lace which imitate the actual appearance of the finished article, in the imitation of old marble such as is to be seen in the model of the Apollino which obtained a gold medal, whilst the same student was only awarded a bronze for an excellent model of the nude from life. The examiners in one branch, metal and jewellery work :

are pleased to see no examples of the debased form of design of "l'art nouveau."

If it is not so evident in this section, l'art nouveau is yet exerting in other departments its baleful influence in the elbows, swirls and contortions that are its characteristics. Yet when we have said the worst we can of certain regrettable tendencies, there is so much that is promising among these students, that we must ardently hope that they will receive practical encouragement to continue and develop.

A very bad example of design is shown in the cover of the catalogue, in which the crown is balanced most unhappily on the English rose. It would be a good exercise for promising pupils to convert the rose, sham-rock and thistle, with the letters E., R., into the portrait of the king, the prize to be awarded to the design which shows the greatest economy of line. Appropriateness is one of the first qualities of good design, and this fact is too frequently neglected in the schools.

B. S.

MR. STRANG IN BOND ST.—AND PICCADILLY

THAT an exhibition of the pictures rejected in any given year by the Royal Academy would be not less interesting—and possibly more instructive—than the display of those accepted is a contention which has frequently been advanced by critics of that institution; but, whatever this Salons des Refusés might contain, it has hitherto been impossible to believe that it would include examples of the art of an A.R.A. We have long ceased to be surprised that the work of a distinguished foreign artist, like M. Rodin, or of a distinguished British "outsider," like Mr. Havard Thomas, should be turned away from the doors of Burlington House; but the consideration hitherto shown by the Council to Academicians and Associates ill prepares us for its rejection of two works by a member of the Royal Academy. The achievement of this unparalleled feat has only been rendered possible this spring by the election of two Associate-Engravers, and the Council with unexpected promptitude has seized the opportunity to read one of the pair a sharp lesson in Academic manners and taste.

Although Associate-Engravers are given the courtesy title of A.R.A. and their names are allowed to figure among those of the Associates on what has been termed the "prospectus page" of the Royal Academy catalogue, they have none of the rights of Associates. They have no votes in elections, their work, with the exception of their engravings, is as liable to rejection as that of any "outsider" of repute. Now in the by-laws of Burlington House it is written: "Members of the Academy are allowed to send six works;" and Mr. William Strang, rashly opining that his election as Associate-Engraver implied membership, was doubtless conscious of forbearance when he deposited only four "works" at the august portal. Unfortunately, Mr. Strang so little realised the lowliness of his lot that he included two oil paintings in his quartet, and had the temerity to conceive that the pictures of a mere engraver—who had received medals for his paintings in Paris, Dresden, and similar inconspicuous continental art-centres—would be as acceptable to the more exacting jury of the Royal Academy of London as the finished productions of such painters as Mr. St. George Hare, Mr. Sigismond Goetze and Mrs. Louise Jopling.

Mr. Strang has had his lesson, and, being unwilling to humiliate him further, we will only add that he will be wise in the future to refrain from obtruding his paintings upon the select company of Burlington House. We have carefully examined the two rejected pictures, In the Beginning and Evening, which are now together with other paintings, drawings and etchings by Mr. Strang, on view at the Fine Art Society's (148 New Bond Street); and, though we discover in them qualities we have remarked in the work of Holbein, Titian, Rembrandt and other painters who enjoyed some reputation in past ages, we cannot find in these, nor indeed in any of his work, the remotest resemblance to the paintings of Sir E. J. Poynter, Mr. Marcus Stone or Mr. H. W. B. Davis. In these painful circumstances, Mr. Strang would surely do well to realise that his paintings, whether portraits, landscapes or allegorical subjects, are far better outside than inside the Royal Academy. If he wishes to exhibit his pictures in London elsewhere than at a dealer's, let him send them, as he has done before, to the International Society, the New English Art Club, or some other society of artists who have the frankness to acknowledge, without bitterness, that their work is out of sympathy with the general quality of work at Royal Academy exhibitions.

MUSIC

SILENCE

MUST modern music so partake of the hurry of modern life as to seem to rush ever forwards in a motor-car? A great many people ask this question, and a great many more people brush them on one side as old-fashioned and ignorant of the trend of art; and, if a writer dare give expression to the inarticulate murmurs of these simple ones and plead for repose, he is a reactionary, and we must not depend on him. But sometimes, when we have left the musical arena, when for some time all the daily food of music has been supplied by thought and heard only with the inward ear, or has been of nature's making, it is inevitable that we should bring the conscious art-made music to be judged by wider standards. Probably every musician who comes face to face with the beauties of nature upon a holiday walk finds some phrase of notes called forth in his mind, answering to this message: If he be a composer it may be his own, or at any rate something which he has never heard before; if he be just a lover of music it will, perhaps, be from the symphonies of Beethoven or whatever finds highest place in his affections; but, however that may be, herein must lie the point of connection between the music which is his expression and that greater kind which surrounds him.

When a piece of music is completely enjoyable in face of nature's music, it must mean that somehow it is in miniature a perfect expression of the same beauty as that which nature shows. To take a very simple instance: on a dazzling sunlit morning, before a single blade of grass has lost the crispness which the night dew has brought it, when everything, from the smallest leaf or flower to the pine-trees above or the brook below, glitters with radiant freshness, Mozart's well-known symphony in E flat rings joyfully in the brain. Everything seems Mozart-like; or, rather, it was just this phase of beauty to which Mozart's spirit perfectly corresponded.

Now, if it be true that modern music rides ever in a motor-car, that its atmosphere is heat and hurry, dust and noise, our art must indeed be in a bad way. It is not unnatural that musicians should be impatient of the accusation; they know that it is unjust, that their art, as truly as that of Mozart, is an attempt to express the beautiful, and that their means of expression are infinitely wider than his, if their grasp of their means is less certain. The conditions of art are very different, and there are other types of beauty than Mozart's sparkling morning, some, perhaps, deeper and stronger than his; and nature sings a sterner music to which art has its counterpart. Still, I do not think that it is only the bias of a reactionary mind which makes most essentially modern music sound incomplete, one-sided, when brought to this searching test. Is it not that in our enthusiastic eagerness to broaden the limits of expression, to increase the possibilities of sound, to add to its complexities, to produce new qualities, greater quantities, we have forgotten that sound is but half music, that our music, like nature's, is made up of sounds and silences? The old masters, Mozart and the rest of them, had a sense of balance between the values of sounds and silences which we, in increasing the first without regarding the second, have lost.

After all, silence is the basis, the groundwork, in a way, of music. From silence we take our beginning and to silence we come. We can conceive of perfect silence, but sound is endless, so that silence is our point of contact with the absolute. With increased power of sound, our need for corresponding silence becomes greater if we would keep the poise in our artistic music which makes it a reflection of nature's music. There are degrees in silence as in sound; it is, of course, but a shifting of the point of view, as the concave to the convex, but certain passages may impress us rather as comparative silence than as a slight degree of sound. Every one acknowledges the eloquence of the silent bar as used in the quartets of Haydn and Mozart, and I need hardly say that to increase the number of silent bars in modern music in exact proportion to the increased volume of sound would not produce the same eloquence. But besides absolute there are many degrees of comparative silence, the use of which seems too little understood. One instance of an inspired use of such silence will probably occur to many people readily, as it does to me. The beautiful prelude for strings alone to the second part of "The Dream of Gerontius" is as near to silence as sound can be; it is like silence of which one has become conscious, and to which one listens as in the stillness of the night.

How greatly such passages increase the power of those in which sound holds full and undisputed sway need not be pointed out, but it is not merely a temporary decrease in volume, a sort of shutting off steam for the sake of greater effect afterwards that I am speaking of. That, I think, is realised and valued, and by none more than by such composers as Liszt, Tschaikevsky and Richard Strauss; and yet I cannot think that they ever realised the power of silence as a positive end to be achieved, as a snowclad mountain top to be reached. Perhaps Strauss may yet do so, unlikely though it at first sight appears, for there is something in the ending of "Ein Heldenleben" which seems to make it not impossible.

It is a widening of outlook rather than merely a change of procedure which will bring silence again to its own in music. There are many other symptoms than the music itself which show it at present to be rather far away. The anxiety of composers to explain themselves to their audience, to tell exactly what they mean, that they may be listened to in the way they mean and no other, seems to indicate that the repose which speaks through silence has no large share in their work. We are coming to the time of provincial festivals, when we shall be presented with new works and badgered with fussy explanations of them. The latter we may put aside; in the works themselves we shall look for advance in beauty of expression, and if I mistake not, the next steps forward will be found to lead rather towards the same mountain tops than through the busy commerce of the plain.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. METHUEN'S autumn list contains a number of important announcements. Of the series of Shakespeare Folios which they are reproducing by photography on pure linen paper, the Third and Fourth are ready, and the Second is in preparation and will be published shortly. An introduction to the Folios by Mr. A. W. Pollard is promised. A study of Blake—the man, the poet and the artist—by Mr. Laurence Binyon, is to be issued in two volumes quarto, at a guinea net each. The first will contain a complete set of the Illustrations of the Book of Job, reproduced in photogravure in the exact size of the originals; the second, fifty-four plates of The Songs of Innocence and Experience, reproduced in size and colour of the originals from the copy lately in the possession of Lord Crewe. Either volume may be purchased separately. Among the biographies promised are: "From Midshipman to Field-Marshal," Sir Evelyn Wood's story of his life; "Marie Antoinette," by Hilaire Belloc; "Beauties of the Seventeenth Century," by Allan Fea; "Garrick and his Circle," by Mrs. Clement Parsons; "The Life of Henry Stuart, Cardinal York," by H. M. Vaughan; "Thomas à Kempis, his Age and Book," by J. E. G. de Montmorency; "George Herbert and his Times," by A. G. Hyde; "St. Catherine and her Times," by Margaret Roberts; "Queen Louisa of Prussia," by Mary M. Moffat; and another life of "Nelson's Lady Hamilton," by E. Hallam Moorhouse. Of books on art, the most important are: "European Enamels," by H. Cunyngame, and "English Coloured Books," by Martin Hardie—both in the Connoisseur's Library; "The Art of the Greeks," by H. B. Waters, and "Velazquez," by A. de Beruete, translated by Hugh E. Poynter—both in a new series, entitled Classics of Art; "The Child in Art," by Margaret Carpenter; "Aims and Ideals in Art," by George Clausen; and "The Arts of Japan," by Edward Dillon, in the Little Books on Art series. Other volumes of interest are: "The Coming of the Saints," by J. W. Taylor; "Parish Life in Mediæval England," by Abbot Gasquet, "The Bells of England," by Canon J. Raven, and "The Domesday Inquest," by Adolphus Ballard—all three in the Antiquary's Books series; "A Wanderer in London," by E. V. Lucas; a selection of poems by Wordsworth; and "A Sailor's Garland: Poems of the Sea," collected by John Masefield. We gave a list of Messrs. Methuen's forthcoming novels in our issue of June 30.

The Oxford University Press announces "The Oxford Anthology of English Literature," by G. E. and W. H. Hadow, in three volumes, the object of which is to indicate the chief landmarks in the progress of English literature. The first volume traces the course of prose and poetry (other than dramatic) from Beowulf to the writers of the Jacobean age: the second volume will follow the history of the English drama to the same terminal limit; and the third volume will take up the record at the time of Milton and will continue it to that of Tennyson and Browning. For each volume characteristic examples have been selected with such brief introductions, critical, explanatory, or biographical, as the occasion seems to require. The extracts have been made on a scale as far as possible commensurate with their importance. The first volume will be ready in August.

Messrs. Constable have in the press a book on the subject of "Time and Clocks," by Mr. H. H. Cunynghame. The book is based on the series of lectures delivered by the author at the Royal Institute, and covers and explains, as far as they are known, the methods employed in all ages for measuring and indicating time. Numerous illustrations in the text assist in making clear the principles of time measurement employed by the ancients, and carry the subject down to the present day. —The same firm announce for early publication a volume of poems entitled "The Crackling of Thorns," by Captain Kendall—the "Dum-Dum" of Punch.

As the result of investigations extending over a period of many years, Sir Alnoth E. Wright has written a book on the microscope which Messrs. Archibald Constable will publish. It will contain a vocabulary of technical terms.

Like St. Andrews, Glasgow University, which has made arrangements to celebrate the quater-centenary of George Buchanan's birth, will publish a memorial volume, and a foremost place is to be given to the address which Principal Lindsay is to deliver at the gathering at the University on November 1. The essay by Mr. T. D. Robb on "Sixteenth-Century Humanism, as illustrated in the life and work of Buchanan," which recently gained the one hundred guinea prize offered through the University of St. Andrews, will be included; and there are to be contributions by Professor Hume Brown and Mr. J. T. T. Brown, who will re-examine the argument for Milton's authorship of the 1642 translation of "Baptistes"; and bibliographical notes by various writers. Messrs. MacLehose will issue the volume, probably before the end of November.

Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Limited, will publish shortly a small pocket English Dictionary, at the low price of fourpence, compiled with the object of supplying a clear and concise definition of many thousands of difficult words likely to occur in reading. A useful appendix contains lists of English, Latin and Greek prefixes, suffixes, roots, foreign words, phrases, and abbreviations.

"The Life of Sir Tobie Matthew, Knight," by A. H. Mathew and Annette Calthrop is to be published shortly by Mr. Elkin Mathews. Subscribers to the Lending Libraries may be glad to know that this volume can be obtained at all of them, as soon as the book is issued. Those who wish to avoid waiting for it, however, should apply to their respective libraries promptly, as the first edition has already been ordered, and some few weeks must elapse after the issue of the first edition has taken place before the second can be ready.

Mr. Walter Winans has a new book in preparation which will probably be entitled "The Sporting Rifle, and what it has taught of Nature." The volume which will be elaborately illustrated, will be published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Mr. T. N. Foulis has opened an office and warehouse at 23 Bedford Street.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ANCIENTS AND A FUTURE LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—“A Student of Literature” will pardon me, I hope, if, though he makes no reference to my letter in your issue of the 28th ult., I take his letter in to-day's issue (August 4) to have mine in view, and will allow me to add that he has wholly misunderstood my point. I referred in no way to literary quality, but solely to a social fact. I admitted the melancholy which pervades classic works wherever death is the theme. I take exception only to the practice of many modern writers of taking for granted that it is universal, and I showed that it is not so. If I quoted from the Anthology it was on account of its affording me the opportunity of proving that one of the Fathers of the Church was actually more despondent in his tone when speaking of Death than some Pagan writers. Beauty of thought and language are not to the point. Vain, too, is the heap of quotations from modern authors. They could one and all be shown to contradict themselves.

Take Shakespeare. How about his Death is a fearful thing ;

To die and go we know not where, etc. ?

Against Pascal's "Je tends les bras à mon Libérateur," set his "Death itself is less painful when it comes upon us unawares than the bare contemplation of it even when danger is far distant."

How, too, as to Byron ?

Death is a thing that makes men weep,

and his

A sleep without dreams, after a rough day
Of toil is what we covet most ; and yet
How clay shrinks back from more quiescent clay.

Which brings somehow to mind Gray's :

For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey
This pleasing anxious being ere resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing, ling'ring look behind.

And would one expect to find in Burnet a way like this of dealing with the dogma of Eternal Life, which shows a lesser confidence in it than Socrates felt ?

"Let us be adventurers for another world. It is at least a fair and noble chance ; and there is nothing in this worth our thoughts or our passions. If we should be disappointed we are still no worse than the rest of our fellow mortals ; and, if we succeed in our expectations, we are eternally happy."

This passage must remind many of Pascal's like way of arguing in favour of belief in the Christian faith.

If Homer makes Achilles utter the despairing cry of the eleventh Book of the Odyssey, there is the following very different passage in the fourth Book (I give Cowper's rendering) :

Thee the Gods

Have destined to the blest Elysian isles, Earth's utmost bound'ries (Rhadamanthus there
For ever reigns, and there the human kind
Enjoy the easiest life ; no snow is there,
No biting winter and no drenching shower,
But zephyr always gently from the sea
Breathes on them, to refresh the happy race).

Now to conclude with the following passage from Pindar's second Olympic, and I hope I shall have succeeded in showing that we moderns are in no better position generally, if not absolutely, as regards a repugnance towards Death, or in the preciseness of our notions of the hereafter, than were the best minds among the Greeks and Romans :

But in the happy fields of light,
Where Phœbus with an equal ray
Illuminates the balmy night
And gilds the cloudless day,
In peaceful, unmolested joy,
The good their smiling hours employ ;
Them no uneasy wants constrain
To vex th' ungrateful soil,
To tempt the dangers of the billowy main,
And break their strength with unabating toil
A frail disastrous being to maintain.
But in their joyous calm abodes,
The recompence of justice they receive,
And in the fellowship of gods
Without a tear eternal ages live. (WEST.)

Away from preachers or writers on divinity, "A Student of Literature" will have to search very widely and long before he will find anything in more modern poetry which comes as near as this to what might well be the Christian ideal of a future state. I will not refer again to Paul's ecstatic exclamation, but to the conclusion of Sir Thomas Browne's "Christian Morals" (section xxx.) for the embodiment of what ought to be the Christian frame of mind. Let it be read, and then let the reader consider how rare is that state and how much rarer its transfusion into our literature.

Who with health, and free from poverty, with a love of literature, science, art, nature, and the use of one's mental and physical powers, would, could, or ought to wish to leave this world ? It is death, sickness, adversity (which the ancients studied to bear heroically when they befell them) which make us hope for another ; and that other we fashion, as some of the ancients did, according to our own temperaments, or moods, if we try to fashion it at all.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Referring to Mr. Phipson's letter in the ACADEMY to-day, may I state there are several lists of amended spelling in this country and in America: The Pitman Institute, Bath. We are moving for State or Government sanction for some form of spelling reform for use in public schools.

E. JONES.

Liscard, August 4.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Hav frendz, like F. Mayhew, ever askt themselfz the question: Cud filolojists, in Chaucer's day, hav asertaind the history and determind the etimology ov wordz, seeing that hiz orthografy woz different from ourz? To step over Spenser, let us ask him again: Az Shakespear rote hiz poemz and the printerz printed them without j, u, and very larly without w, and az hiz and their orthografy woz not the same az the prezent, cud the filolojists ov that period hav trased the history and discoverd the derivashon ov wordz az spelt by Shakespear? Woz etimology a ded-leter? Haz he ever askt himself how came we to spel az we doo? Does he think that the history and derivashon ov wordz iz best prezervd and procured and cud not be exsept by the prezent orthografy? If so, why wer Caedmon, Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespear, and Milton permitted to rite differently from us and differently from each uther? Iz it by a speshal Providens that our filolojists hav been favord by this Heven-made English spelling? If F. Mayhew thinks so, iz it not singular that not a singl English filolojist and not a singl wun in America aproovz ov it, but utterly condemz it. Professor Skeat haz declared: "In the interests ov etimology, I wish the comon speling were utterly smasht"; and Dr. J. A. H. Murray, editor ov the mamoth New English Dicshonary, says: "My Dicshonary experiens haz alredy shown me that the ordinary apeelz to etimology against speling reform utterly break down upon examinashon. The etimological informashon supozed to be enshrined in the current speling iz sapt at its very foundashon by the fact that it iz, in sober fact, oftener rong than riht, that it iz oftener the fansiez ov pedants or sciolists ov the Renascence, or monkish etimolojerz ov stil erlier tmeiz, that ar thus prezervd, than the truth which alone iz ἐτιμολογία. . . The tradishonal and suedo-etimological spelings ov the last few centuriez ar the direst foez with which jenuin etimology haz to contend; they ar the very curs ov the etimolojist's labor, the thornz and thistlz which everywher choke the golden grain of truth, and aford satisfacshon only to the braying asses which think them az good az wheat."

Can F. Mayhew consev such eminent men az Professor Skeat, Dr. Murray, and a host of utherz, making such declarashonz, if fonetic speling wud obscure the derivashon ov wordz, increes their laborz, and thro English into confuzhon?

Az a reformashon, or even a simplificashon, to say nothing ov a fonetizashon ov English spelling, iz not likely to be carried out in a drastic fashon, ther iz no feer ov English literature becoming a seeld trezhur. However "clothed" no orthografic garment can smother the producschons ov ancient or modern ritters, any more than the introducschon ov the Tonic Sol Fah notashon can efase musical compozishonz in the staf notashon.

DOGGEREL AND FALSE QUANTITIES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Is it not strange that Mr. Coulton has apparently failed to observe that there are three false quantities in the four lines "quoted by Salimbene," viz., fnitā, pūllies, cīmices?

"TO QUAIL" (To lose heart)

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In a note of mine on the etymology of "Saracen," which appeared lately in the ACADEMY, it was pointed out how Hensleigh Wedgwood in his "Dictionary of English Etymology," published forty years ago, was the only lexicographer who had ever entered a caveat against the popular account of the word that it meant originally "Oriental." Hensleigh Wedgwood is the only lexicographer, as far as I know, who suggests a reasonable etymology for the word "to quail" used in the sense of "to lose heart." In nearly every dictionary, for example, in Richardson, Webster, Annandale, Skeat, the word has been associated with the old English forms cwelan, to die, and cwellan, to kill. This was the view of Dr. Johnson, who in his dictionary equates quail, to lose spirit, with Dutch kwelen (quelen), to pine. It never seems to have occurred to these scholars that such an etymology is quite inadmissible, as the vowel sound of "quail" cannot be made to correspond with the original vowel of old English cwelan or cwellan.

Wedgwood didn't care a brass button about phonetic laws, but he had a very keen sense for what is probable in the connection and development of meanings. And this intuitive feeling suggested to him the etymology of our word "quail." He says: "To quail, as when we speak of one's courage falling, is probably a special application of quail in the sense of curdle." The use of the verb "quail" (to curdle) is abundantly illustrated in the Oxford Dictionary and in the English Dialect Dictionary. It is the same word as Fr. cailler, to curdle, coagulate, a sister-form of which is Ital. cagliare. This word is thus Englished by Florio: "to cruddle as milk, to grow hard and thick; to begin to be afraid of one's adversary or enemy, to hold one's peace." This is precisely the meaning of the English word we are discussing.

An attempt has been made lately to connect the word "quail," to lose heart, with the bird, the "quail," but the quail is not a particularly timorous bird.

A. L. MAYHEW.

A PLANTAGENET ON THE PLANTAGENETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As one who is himself directly descended from the Plantagenets, I was naturally more than usually interested to hear of the rumour that the English Government is once more "pressing its claims" to have the tombstones of the Plantagenet kings and queens, who were buried in the Abbey of Fontevault, removed to Westminster. This, it appears, is not the first occasion on which the question of transferring the monuments to England has been mooted, for in 1867 Napoleon III. made an offer of them to Queen Victoria, but there arose among French learned bodies, artists, archæologists, and even lawyers an agitation so strong that the Emperor had to request permission to withdraw his offer—a permission which was readily granted. In view of this fact I do not think it in the least likely that these memorable monuments (there are four of them) will ever be removed from their original resting-places. The four tombstones, by the way, are those of Henry II. of England and his wife, Eléonore de Guyenne (who died at the Abbey of Fontevault in 1204), Richard Cœur-de-Lion, and Isabelle d'Angoulême, wife of John Lackland. It was Stothard, the traveller, who in 1816 discovered these tombstones in the cellars of the ancient and famous Abbey, but the royal bones had been, shameful to relate, scattered at the Revolution. Other of the Plantagenets were buried here, but all trace of them has long ago disappeared.

WHITE NIGHTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—What exactly is a white night, and who coined the phrase? I met it first in Kipling's poem, "La Nuit Blanche," where the phrase connotes a revelry of waking nightmare:

"Then a creature, skinned and crimson, Ran about the floor and cried."

Then came Stephen Heller, the composer, with his "Nuits Blanches," translated on the cover of Litolf's edition as "Restless Nights," a conversion indeed of Kipling's gory creature.

And now, in "Marius the Epicurean," Pater, describing the ancestral mansion of Marius, speaks of "that coy, retired place—surely nothing could happen there, without its full accompaniment of thought or reverie. White-nights! so you might interpret its old Latin name. [Ad Virgilias Albas.] . . . So, white-nights, I suppose, after something like the same analogy, should be nights not of quite blank forgetfulness, but passed in continuous dreaming, only half veiled by sleep."

One would like to be sure, in handling such a beautiful, arresting phrase, whether it meant delirium, or restlessness, or reverie, half veiled by sleep.

JOHN BLAND.

ROSTRA NOT ROSTRUM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is singular how frequently in the course of one's reading one comes across the mistake of writing rostrum for rostra, as a synonym for "platform." If the error were to be found only in work bearing no evidence of classical attainment it could easily be explained as the consequence of taking it for granted that a singular form must be the correct one for the name of a single object. But it is not so; the mistake is universal: it appears not only in the reports of ignorant "penny-a-liners" and in the sermons of under-educated Dissenting ministers, but in work characterised by scrupulous care in the externals of literary art as well as diversified by classical allusions to an extent with which so stupid a blunder seems most inconsistent.

The almost invariable selection by writers of repute such as Ruskin, Frank Smedley and Thomas Hardy of the word rostra (and they misspell it) when the word suggestus or the English words platform, dais, stage—or even hustings—for the connection in which the idea of a raised horizontal surface is required in literature is very frequently political—would equally well suit their purpose, shows that no uncertainty about its inflection exists in their minds.

The platform in the Roman forum was called rostra because adorned with the beaks, i.e., the beak-like prows, of ships, the prizes of naval victory. Surely the knowledge of this should serve to protect those who use the word in novels and newspaper causeries from spelling it as it is spelt in ornithological treatises with propriety.

LINDSAY S. GARRETT.

THE PRONUNCIATION OF DETAIL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I invite from some of your learned readers an expression of opinion as to the correct pronunciation of the word "detail" (noun).

Recently I heard Mr. Haldane in the House of Commons and

Mr. George Alexander on the stage pronounce it "détail," but on consulting the Standard Dictionary I find the balance of authority is in favour of "detail."

THE BOOKSHELF

SCHOLARS cannot be too grateful to the Cambridge University Press for their facsimiles of unique books in their possession. Not long ago we received their Lydgate's "Assemble of Goddes" reproduced from the only known copy; and we have before us now Benet Burgh's translation of the "Parvus Cato" and the "Magnus Cato," printed at Westminster by Caxton about the year 1477. The tract is the second of eight contained in a volume of small pieces, chiefly by Chaucer and Lydgate, printed separately by Caxton at the very outset of his career at Westminster, and belonging formerly to John Moore, Bishop of Ely (1646-1714). It came into the possession of the University of Cambridge through the gift of George I. in 1715, and is, as we have stated, the only known copy. Benet, or Benedict, Burgh, the translator, was Archdeacon of Colchester and "high canon" of St. Stephen's at Westminster; and the translations were made "for the erudition of my Lord Bousher, son and heir at that time to my lord the erle of Estsex." Lord Bouchier, the preface to this facsimile informs us, was killed at the battle of Barnet, April 14, 1471. The translations are in verse, mainly in stanzas of seven lines rhyming A.B.A.B.C.C., and we may give as an example the opening lines of the "Parvus Cato."

Whan I aduerte to my remembrance
And see how fele folkes erren greuously
In the wey of vertuose governance
I have supposed in myn hert that I Oughte to supporte and conseyle prudently
Them to be vertuous in luyng,
And how they shal them self in honour bring.

These volumes of facsimile are not only things of beauty and treasure in themselves, but they are of great and special practical use in the case of unique books. To reproduce them thus is the only way of ensuring absolute accuracy in the dissemination of the text.

A Digest of the Law of Copyright with Appendix of Statutes. By E. J. Macgillivray. (Butterworth & Co., 7s. 6d. net).—Brevity is so seldom a blemish that we are loth to find fault with Mr. Macgillivray's effort to cast our copyright law into a code of seventy-two pages. Yet it is not easy to see the practical utility of such an exercise, while the price at which the work is issued is excessive. This said, it may be frankly conceded that Mr. Macgillivray has discharged his thankless task with great dexterity. He covers currente calamo in this pamphlet; Unpublished Works; Literary Copyright; Performing Right; Paintings, Drawings and Photographs; Engravings and Sculpture; and conveys some idea at once of the scope and confusion of English law. The form is a little unfortunate, and not a little perplexing. A Digest of the actual law would have been useful, if only as a warning to legislators. But Mr. Macgillivray is not content with the law as it stands. He starts off, for instance, with a definition of "literary work," for which there is no authority, and ignores that of "book" which is determined by the Copyright Act 1842. Nor can "Caird v. Sime" be regarded as rectifying the omission from the Copyright Act of any definition of "publication," and at English law there is no binding rule as to its incidents. The statement on page 8 that the proprietor may by oral delivery abandon the common law right in a "literary work" is, again, unsupported by authority and is misleading. The sections dealing with Foreign Works (seven pages); British Possessions (two pages); and Foreign Countries (three pages) are obviously inadequate. The Appendix contains only the Copyright Act 1842, and the Fine Arts Copyright Act 1862, whereas the reader would expect to find the Dramatic Copyright Act 1833; the Lecture Act 1835; the International Copyright Acts, 1844, 1852, 1875 and 1886; the Foreign Reprints Act 1847, and at least a summary of the Engraving Acts in an "Appendix of Statutes" to such a Digest.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE sudden death of Mrs. Craigie (John Oliver Hobbes) puts an end to a hope that some of us had fondly cherished for years—the hope of a novel from her pen worthy of her great gifts. Remembering the brilliant, if excessive, epigram of her earliest ventures—"Some Emotions and a Moral" and others—the tenderness and simplicity of "The Herb Moon," the impressive power and depth of "The School for Saints," many had hoped that all her good qualities, her wit, her brilliance of language, her power of description, her profound religious sense, her fine imagination, would some time be joined in a great and human novel. We noted her carelessness in construction, her vagueness of outline, and believed that some day a more passionate interest in her plot would remove these objections: we even watched her following after strange worldly gods and turning her back on humanity, and hoped that not always would she consider birth the sole criterion of interest. We hoped, in fact, that with advancing years a larger sympathy with human nature would come to inspire her.

Death has prevented that development, which, indeed, had not yet begun. The gravest charge that can be brought against her work, the fault that mars it all, is a coldness, an aloofness, a want of sympathy with human nature. It reveals, in fact, a scorn of humanity which is fatal to good work. It is not too much to say that most men and women, in the eyes of "John Oliver Hobbes," were beneath notice. How much of this sentiment was due to her birth and training, this is not the place to inquire. The result of it is that she remained in her unreal, exquisite world, weaving fancies that became more and more remote from life, wrapping herself in a cold superiority that robbed her work of its life-blood. And so an exceptionally brilliant mind has left no worthy memorial behind it.

The case of Dr. Ray Lankester has not advanced during the week; and we do not propose again entering into the relations of the Trustees and the ex-Director. An interesting example of the long debt of science to Dr. Lankester is afforded by the fact that he is quoted as the acknowledged authority on structure in the early chapters of Darwin's book on earth-worms which was begun, if we go back to the embryo, in 1837, though not published till 1881. In some respects Dr. Lankester's attainments singularly resemble Huxley's. Huxley was one of the best writers of nervous English of his time and especially excelled in polemics. "We are all right," said Darwin in effect, "if we can retain Huxley"; and Darwin, whose soul abhorred controversy, relied upon him almost wholly as his weapon of offence. Dr. Lankester has a large portion of Huxley's fighting style; and the enemies of compulsory Greek showed not a little wisdom in accepting him as their protagonist. It must be confessed that almost all the great men of science—there are those among them so philological as to object to "scientist"—have written good strong English; and not a few of them have taken much pride in their style. We once heard an Oxford lecturer in chemistry boasting that he "usually" read a chapter or two from the minor prophets before delivering a lecture, for the sake of style! Is it from such a source that Dr. Lankester's many Jeremiads have sucked their inspiration?

Some well-known French novelists have recently founded a society with the object of protecting the rights of French novelists abroad, especially in cases of plagiarism and of bad translations. They have begun operations in Germany, as two-thirds of the novels published in that country are said to be either adaptations or translations of French works. An office has been opened in Paris for the purpose of making translations, and a notice has been sent to German editors informing them that no work of the members of the society is to be published under the form of a translation, unless the translation has been made under the superintendence of duly appointed officials of the society who reside in Paris. Solicitors have been appointed in various German towns to watch over the interests of the society, and it has been resolved to bring any violation of its rules before a court of law. It is intended later to adopt the same system in other countries, and we may expect to have a branch of the society established in London.

These practical steps to protect the rights of French authors merit praise, and already a great success has been obtained. We referred at the beginning of last month (July 7) to a case that had been brought by two French publishers before the Roumanian High Court of Appeal, to define their rights as foreigners. The High Court has just given a decision that is in favour of the publishers. The consequence is that henceforth it will be impossible to put plays on the Roumanian stage without the consent of the author, or to reproduce foreign music without an arrangement with the composer. Probably, too, it will be impossible to issue unauthorised translations of novels. A literary congress will be held at Bucharest on September 21 and the following days, when there will be a debate upon the question of the adhesion of Roumania to the Berne Convention.

A small but suggestive coincidence in grammar may be found in two books published this week. In the preface to his Latin grammar, published by the Cambridge Press, Mr. Sloman protests against the infliction on the schoolboy of the Terentian cliché, "Irae amantium amoris integratio 'st'" on the ground that the singular verb is a poetic licence. The parallel to the objection appears in the notes to a book of selections, intended for boys, from the best poets. In criticising "The Recessional," the author points out the ill-concord in the line:

The tumult and the shouting dies, giving the ordinary explanation. But objection is wholly hypercritical in both cases. It is a latitude demanded by language and generally accepted by all but purists that the verb may be in concord with its nearest substantive and may always be singular when the list of subjects are at all similar. It is worth remembering, while we are on the subject of "the Recessional," that M. Chevrillon, one of the most acute of French critics, objected to the poem for missing the very virtues claimed for it by the writer of the notes in this anthology. We are inclined to agree with the Frenchman.

A rather amusing study in French idiom is provided by a list, issued by a French amateur association, of the technical terms generally adopted on French golf courses. The French, always catholic in taste, show no tendency to adopt the Kaiser's exclusive method. Even "sport" is a "forbidden" word in Germany and presumably "tee" and "dormie" are also taboo. The French, on the other hand, have adopted all the English names for clubs, the iron alone excepted; and the iron is "Le Fer." Most other golf terms however, have a French form. Caddie is "cadet" which we may presume to be the original form of the word, altered on the Scotch tongue. "Tee"—French "Dé"—has perhaps the same history. A "lie" is assiette. "Poter" is not to "putt"—for which no word exists—but to "hole out" and there is something rather ludicrously French in the phrase "Trou d'arrivée." Our idiom delights in brevity. The French, especially in sport, enjoy rotundity. Does not the principal French boating club rejoice in the title of "Société pour l'encouragement des sports nautiques à Paris"?

It will be a shock to the enthusiasts who have devoted time and money to visiting Norfolk in order to see the skull of the author of "Religio Medici" to learn that the doubt as to the genuineness of the relic now appears to be well founded. A local antiquary has discovered a reference in the Mackerell Manuscripts which suggests that Archdeacon Jefferys was buried in Sir Thomas Browne's vault in St. Peter Mancroft Church, and the skull, which Dr. Edward Lubbock secured from that vault some sixty years ago, was presumably Jefferys's. The matter will, of course, be investigated to the full.

Where do all the cheap reprints go to? Every new publisher seems to think that the royal road to success is to be found in a Library of Familiar Classics. There is very little attempt at novelty except in regard to printing and binding. The same works appear in every reprint library, as though time had determined once and for all the limits beyond which it would not be safe to go. The result is sameness, and increased wonder at the capacity of the public to absorb edition after edition of particular works by Dickens, Carlyle, Thackeray, Scott and the rest. Do people read these books or do they buy them to adorn a favourite shelf? When nicely bound they are readily taken up by those unfortunate people who are called upon to provide wedding presents. Many purchasers of single volumes read them, of course. They have a special object in view. It is the occasional purchaser who is so much struck with the want of variety in the different libraries. Why, for instance, as a contemporary points out, do we not get a cheap edition of Hakluyt or Purchas as well as of Cook's Voyages? And why is Fielding comparatively neglected? There is a wide field for experiment by some enterprising and resourceful publisher. We are growing a little tired of reprints of the "East Lynne" order.

Not alone in France will the forthcoming publication of the early note-books of Ernest Renan be hailed as a literary and philosophical event of the utmost interest. These note-books, of which Alys Hallard gives a foretaste in the pages of the Independent Review, will serve to reveal "the very germ of the great savant's life-work." They will show Renan in the seed time of his speculations on life, religion and literature. At the age of twenty-two he set down his most intimate thoughts. The notes will make two substantial volumes which his daughter has prepared for the press. Nothing will be touched. No one would presume to edit this collection of confessions and impressions which were destined, after Renan had passed through a period of travail and renunciation for conscience' sake, to blossom into epoch-marking works. As these daily jottings were never intended for publication—indeed at that time Renan can have had no idea of the future which was to be his—they give us in native simplicity and force the man himself, permitting the world at large to get a glimpse of the inspirations from which Renan was to draw the masterpieces of his maturity. In many cases the publication of mere juvenilia does a deadly wrong to a great man's reputation. In Renan's case the revelations of his early self will only confirm the world's conviction of his entire sincerity and devotion to truth.

Two extracts from among those quoted in the Independent may appropriately be given here. Renan, like most men plethoric of thought, did not find it easy to convey what was in him to others:

The poet and the thinker can only express the very smallest part of themselves. That which is the most precious, the untranslatable, the inexpressible, the delicate source of sentiment, the keen acumen which has no name—all that is there, hidden. It is this which is the despair of the poet. For he feels the need of expressing himself outwardly; and this is not petty conceit. It is a primordial sentiment of nature, like the instinct of sociability.

He was convinced that "humanity and philosophy were getting richer all the time, by more and more valuable results"—results to which he was destined to contribute so largely. He felt that in order to exercise real influence Science and Criticism must be blended with poetry, "with the ideal creation":

A poet alone, constructing by himself, will do nothing. The past occupies too great a place for it not to be obligatory for every one to say what he has to say about it. It would be like a system that said nothing of God.

The Mysore Government, which has always been in the van of progress, has just created a new institution at Bangalore, the seat of the administration, which possesses a literary and educational value. This is a Press Room in which the staff of the different newspapers of Mysore as well as the correspondents of other Indian journals are supplied with all official papers and records. The most needed works of general reference and files of the principal English and vernacular newspapers are also available. Mr. Madhava Rao, C.I.E., the Minister who has just founded this institution in a pleasant office in Cubbon Park, the Whitehall of Bangalore, is following the example of the Government of India which created a similar institution in August 1904.

Mr. Horace Traubel—Whitman's Boswell—has published in America an interesting book entitled "With Walt Whitman in Camden." Mr. Traubel sat at his hero's feet, note-book in hand, and his memoir would have been the better for a little judicious editing; but there are many interesting records of conversations with the poet which reveal curious likes and dislikes, expressed in a typically American way. Asked by his biographer whether he had met Crabbe, Whitman replied:

Yes—once; and he is the thinnest, most uninteresting man I ever struck—the typical Sunday-school superintendent, with all that that signifies. I am told that he has a class, a Sunday-school class, in Boston—that he conducts it from Sunday to Sunday. I don't see how such a man could interest anybody for ten minutes, much less an afternoon.

Howells, Aldrich, good fellows: I have met them and like them (Howells especially is genial and ample—rather inclined to be big—full size) but they are thin—no weight; such men are in certain ways important—they run a few temporary errands, but they are not out for immortal service: perhaps even Hawthorne, though not surely Hawthorne, in whom there is a morbid streak to which I can never accommodate myself. I call this thing in our modern literature delirium tremens.

Of Browning he said:

I have read Browning, but I do not feel that I know him. I realize him—that is, I see him for a great figure—I see him for a proud achievement . . . but I do not feel that I know his books. I have read "The Ring and the Book," "Paracelsus," some scattering poems (many of them, in fact)—that is all. My impression has been not that he was not for anybody but that he was not for me, though Professor Corson says that I am mistaken, that Browning is my man, only that I have not so far got at him the right way. I do not assent to that—Corson does not know my appetite and my capacity as well as I know it myself. One thing I always feel like saying about Browning—that I am always conscious of his roominess; he is no way a small man: all his connections are big strong.

His view of Matthew Arnold is curious:

Arnold has been writing new things about the United States [he said]. Arnold could know nothing about the States—essentially nothing:

the real things here—the real dangers as well as the real promises—a man of his sort would always miss. Arnold knows nothing of elements—nothing of things as they start. I know he is a significant figure—I do not propose to wipe him out. He came in at the rear of a procession two thousand years old—the great army of critics, parlor apostles, worshippers of hangings, laces, and so forth and so forth—they never have anything properly at first hand. Naturally I have little inclination their way. But take Emerson, now—Emerson: some ways rather of thin blood, yet a man who with all his culture and refinement, superficial and intrinsic, was elemental and a born democrat.

An instance of the care exercised by men of science over the minutiae of style is supplied by a discussion, of which we heard fragments, over the question whether the programmes of the British Association procedure should refer to "secretaries of section" or "secretaries of sections." Pure logic would be on the side of the advocates of the singular, and this view, we believe, prevailed. But the ear, which is always affected more by use or idiom than unrelated euphony, is certainly irritated by the singular. Those who care for such minutiae—and most people have a quite absurd interest in these vexed questions of grammar—will be able to think of examples on both sides. "Inns of Court" occurs to us on the one side. For the other the declension of paterfamilias secures the authority of the most logical of tongues.

Notwithstanding the imperfect condition of the "Madonna of the Tower," ascribed by Crowe and Cavalcaselle to Raphael, its acquisition by the National Gallery is an event of considerable importance. The picture was originally in the Orleans collection whence, towards the close of the eighteenth century it passed into the hands of Samuel Rogers, the poet. It was bought at the sale of his gallery in 1856 by Mr. R. T. Mackintosh for four hundred and eighty guineas. Four thousand pounds would not buy it to-day, and the debt of gratitude which the public owes to Miss Mackintosh, who has presented it to the National collection, cannot be over-estimated.

The Trustees of the National Portrait Gallery have acquired the following pictures, which will be placed on exhibition as soon as possible: Samuel Johnson, LL.D., a study in oils by Sir Joshua Reynolds for the well-known portrait at Knole—presented by T. Humphry Ward, Esq.; Thomas, second Lord Lyttelton, an old copy after T. Gainsborough—presented by Charles Viscount Cobham, a Trustee of the Gallery; Samuel Cousins, R.A., the mezzotint engraver, painted by James Leakey—presented by the artist's daughter; Robert Dodsley, bookseller, poet, and dramatist, painted by W. Alcock; and two sketches by J. Sanders from the painting of "The Royal Academy in 1772," by J. Zoffany, R.A., in the Royal Collection at Windsor Castle—both presented by Alfred Jones, Esq., of Bath; and Mary Anne Everett Green, historian, drawn in chalks by her husband, George Pycroft Green—presented by her daughter, Mrs. James Gow. The Trustees have accepted the bequest to the Gallery by the late Mr. George J. Holyoake of a portrait in oils of Richard Carlile. As we go to press news comes from America that Whistler's water-colour, "The Lady in Grey," has been purchased for the Metropolitan Museum at New York.

A writer in The Periodical, which Mr. Frowde issues quarterly as a record of the work of the Oxford University Press, gives some interesting recollections concerning "The Ruskin Road at Oxford." "Ruskin first proposed the plan," it is related, "in conversation over the tea-cups with two Scottish undergraduates at Balliol . . . The scheme was further sketched out at a breakfast party in the last term of 1874 and put into execution in the summer term following . . . Arnold Toynbee acted for some time as superintendent of works for Ruskin. The work came to an end in the spring of 1875. I cannot say exactly how or why; certainly not because the road was finished, as any one who goes there can see."

As to the motives, besides Ruskin's personal influence and the tendency to go with one's friends, that actuated the writer and, he supposes, others in "digging," it is remarked: "The current philosophy of the day, though it has inspired much good work since, was unintelligible to some of us, and did not seem to suggest immediate action. And when Ruskin came along and told us to do something, we jumped at it, without asking questions. In 1874 there were no 'University Settlements'; they began in 1884-5. There was very little 'Socialism,' practical or other. 'Parish work' was for various reasons less attractive than it often is now. The present Bishop of London had not yet left school at Marlborough; Canon Barnett became Vicar of St. Jude's in 1873; Mr. C. S. Loch became Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society ('John Ruskin, Esq.,' was one of its Vice-Presidents) in 1875."

Some of the London Public Libraries have scarcely recovered from the effects of the London Government Act; and they are again threatened by a proposal, compared with which the other was quite simple. On the former occasion some libraries, which before had been either central libraries or at all events the only ones in the administrative district, were converted into branch libraries; in one or two cases a branch library became a central. On the broad lines of public good the Act effected an improvement, but it is not so certain that it effected any economy of administration, either in particular boroughs or over the whole of London. Although no scheme has been formulated, it appears that whatever alterations are made next year will be in the direction of the centralisation of the work of the London Boroughs. The proposal of Captain FitzRoy Hemphill, L.C.C., so far as it deals with ordinary municipal work, does not come within the scope of the ACADEMY; it is only in regard to its probable effect upon the Public Libraries of the Metropolis that it concerns our readers. The proposal to include the control of libraries in the duties of the Education Committee of the new London Council, is not likely to be welcomed by the various Metropolitan library authorities.

There is no doubt that centralisation, if properly carried out, would be of immense advantage to the public libraries of the kingdom. Centralisation has been the dream of many librarians for years past. But the only scheme which promises to be wholly successful is the formation of a governmental library board somewhat on the lines of the Board of Education, but dealing only with the public libraries of the country. Acting in a similar capacity to the Board of Education, this department would appoint committees for approved areas, and delegate to them the fullest powers in administration, while retaining financial control. This would equalise the Library system, small starved localities would be better supplied, either by more support for the particular institution or by amalgamation, or inclusion in a larger system. The bugbear of the "penny limit" would be removed, and the Public Library would take the place it should occupy as the centre of the intellectual life of the community.

British Empire Shakespeare Society.—Persons wishing to enter for the elocution competition of this society are asked to send in their names and addresses to Miss Morritt, 17 Southwell Gardens, S.W. (stating whether professional or amateur), before September 30. All competitors must recite two passages—one comedy and the other serious—from Shakespeare's plays. Both scenes and speeches are admissible, providing they do not exceed the time limit of five minutes. Princess Louise Augusta of Schleswig-Holstein will distribute the prizes in this competition in London in November.

LITERATURE

ARISTOTLE AND THE MODERN READER

Aristotle's Theory of Conduct. By THOMAS MARSHALL, M.A.
(Unwin, 21s. net.)

"In the following pages an attempt is made to present Aristotle's Ethics in a readable shape."

So Mr. Marshall in his Preface. And it is no easy task that he has here set himself. For, great as is Aristotle's treatise, it still—as Mr. Marshall himself says—is not literature in the sense in which Plato's works are literature. Cicero, indeed, speaks of the "golden stream" of Aristotle's language. What he can have meant by this we must be content to leave as one of the unsolved problems of literary criticism. For us the greater part of Aristotle must remain, from a purely literary point of view, unattractive reading. Mr. Marshall's undertaking, therefore, was an ambitious one. He is the more to be congratulated on the result. His book—a combination of paraphrase and commentary—is eminently readable. We certainly have read it, not always with agreement, but with pleasure and interest.

The general principle on which Aristotle's theory of happiness is based . . . the value of work and the superiority of an existence in which powers are exercised to one in which they are only possessed . . . is probably his most valuable contribution to the theory of conduct.

This is Mr. Marshall's closing verdict. It may or may not be a correct one, but it may at least be questioned whether Aristotle himself would have subscribed to it. Indeed, if emphasis can be accepted as any guide, it would seem as though, in his eyes, the doctrine of the Mean and the doctrine of the Practical Syllogism were the two most interesting features in his formulation—or reformulation—of the theory of Conduct. Strangely enough, it has been against these two points that criticism, not to say ridicule, has chiefly been directed. And with that criticism, so far as the doctrine of the Mean is concerned, Mr. Marshall appears to associate himself.

Now, it is, no doubt, very little illuminating to be told that there is a vice on each side of a virtue—an excess on the one side, and a defect on the other. But the significance, after all, of "the Mean" only begins where this purely external aspect of it ends: and it can only have been because he had failed to appreciate the real meaning of the doctrine that Kant could have passed upon it the criticism that it makes the difference between vice and virtue merely quantitative. For what, to a more sympathetic interpretation, does the doctrine actually teach? It teaches that Conduct, no less than Art, involves on the one hand a material, and on the other a principle in accordance with which that material is moulded. Our impulses, affections, desires—these, and the actual objects to which they are directed, may be said to be the raw material out of which we, as moral artists, have to shape our lives. The distinctive characteristic of the good man is that he recognises a standard, a limiting principle, in his life. "Evil," Aristotle quotes in this connection, "is of the nature of the Unlimited"; and good can only begin with the admission of a limit—a principle, as we should say. This, which is the heart of the doctrine of the Mean, is not exclusively Aristotelian. He, no doubt, has given to it a new turn, and reduced it to a formula; but its essence is there already in Plato. We are the more surprised to find Mr. Marshall asserting (p. 37) that "no convinced Platonist could accept it." And on p. 131 he commits himself still more definitely:

This conception of moral excellence as moderation is spoken of with contempt by Plato, who calls it "popular and political virtue," and ranks it with the conduct which is found in communities of social insects like bees, wasps, and ants.

This is altogether misleading. The virtue which Plato calls "δημοτική καὶ πολιτική" was criticised by him, not on the ground that it was based upon a principle of "limit" or proportion, but on the plain ground that it was automatic and unreflective, that it was uninspired by any consciousness of the principles upon which it was based (ἐξ ἔθους τε καὶ μελέτης γεγονυῖαν ἀνεί φιλοσοφίας καὶ νοῦ). Mr. Marshall has been in this matter no less unjust to Plato than to Aristotle.

The whole contention that the doctrine of the Mean makes the difference between vice and virtue merely quantitative is, indeed, singularly ungenerous. Is the difference between the good sculptor and the bad—or the good carpenter and the bad; it is all one—"merely quantitative" because it is in the "so much and no more" that the artist's sense of fitness evidences, or externalises, itself? And how is the moral artist to externalise his sense of the fitting if not by introducing, in an analogous way, a limit into the (in itself unlimited) "matter" of conduct?

Virtue, says Aristotle, shows itself as a mean—in the sense that it aims at a mean (στοχεαστική οὐσα τοῦ μέσου). And, by so putting it, he has, deliberately, based morality upon a principle which is equally operative in art, in science, in nature—wherever, in fact, chaos gives place to system. "He might have pointed out," writes Mr. Marshall (p. 131, note) "that it [i.e., the law of the Mean] is shown in the exercise of the senses . . . powerful lights or sounds being painful, and sometimes destructive of the senses." A strange criticism! For this is exactly what Aristotle has pointed out, in a well-known passage. (De An. 424^a 28.)

If we turn from the doctrine of the Mean to that of the Practical Syllogism we find, here too, below the academic formula, a characteristic and important principle—the principle that every action for which a man accepts responsibility, bad no less than good, will reveal upon analysis an end (or general principle) and a means (or particular application). Significant as is from this point of view the Practical Syllogism, it is actually from a different side that, in the Ethics, Aristotle approaches it. He there advances it as in some sense an explanation of the problem of ἀκρασία—the problem, that is, of actions which we commit "against our better judgment." ἀκρασία Mr. Marshall renders by "irresolution." But in accepted usage "irresolution" represents the condition of the man who has difficulty in making up his mind: whereas the ἀκράτης is he who, having made up his mind, is unable to stick to it. And these are two different things. To the Practical Syllogism as an "explanation" of ἀκρασία Mr. Marshall allows perhaps more credit than is its due when he writes (p. 421): "it is not the least valuable of his many contributions to moral philosophy." Of the phenomenon of "knowledge" overridden by desire the Practical Syllogism can hardly be said to provide us with an explanation. It does little more than formulate the facts. The problem is with us still.

Mr. Marshall continues (p. 421):

Unfortunately he has deprived his explanation of much of its value by insisting that the phenomenon of irresolution is, strictly speaking, limited to the cases to which the words self-restraint and confirmed self-indulgence apply.

We fail to understand this. Aristotle, with perfect propriety surely, uses ἀκρασία in the sense in which everybody else used it. (It may be, as Mr. Marshall says, "not the business of moral philosophers to help the public to spoil useful words by giving them a limited and accidental meaning": but still less is it their business to breed misunderstanding by using common words in unfamiliar senses.) But it is difficult to see how he has thereby "deprived his explanation of much of its value"—unless he has at the same time told us that his explanation applies to ἀκρασία, and to ἀκρασία alone. Where has he done that? It is, no doubt, in connection with ἀκρασία that the "explanation" is offered: but he has nowhere suggested that the same psychological analysis might not be applied equally well to other cases in which men fail to act up to their intentions.

There are other points in Mr. Marshall's book to which we should take exception. On p. 146, in a note, we read:

What Aristotle means by choice [this is Mr. Marshall's rendering of proairesis] is impulse or propension, which may be unaccompanied by reason (as in the case of the lower animals or very young children) or may be guided by reason.

Prima facie, this note implies that in Aristotle's opinion children and the lower animals exercise proairesis. It is difficult to believe that Mr. Marshall can have meant to ascribe this doctrine to Aristotle; for he himself quotes, a few pages further on, a passage from the Ethics in which Aristotle expressly denies that the animals share in proairesis. Yet, if he did not mean to do so, he has certainly written a very clumsy note.

For his further statement that "proairesis is not what we call Will" he has no doubt some justification, in so far, that is, as we do normally think of some sense of effort, or tension, as accompanying the exercise of Will. To a psychological analysis this sense of effort may be important, or even essential; but from the point of view of morals (which is the point of view of the Ethics) what is important is the conscious identification of oneself with a motive. And that is precisely what proairesis means. It is no mere intellectual judgment: it is no mere wish: it is a direction of oneself with a view to action; by which, as Aristotle says, character is tested. Perhaps, then, we may allow to Aristotle that, incomplete as may be his psychology of the Will, he has still given us, in proairesis, what, for moral philosophy, is the essence of Will.

Mr. Marshall suggests (p. 159 and p. 172) that τὸ ἡγούμενον, as used in Ethics 1113^a 5, is "the nearest equivalent to Will." This is not a felicitous suggestion. τὸ ἡγούμενον has absolutely no psychological significance whatsoever. In the passage referred to, Aristotle says that, deliberation being a process in which we analyse an end into its means with a view to action, we carry this process on until we bring the principle back to ourselves, "and of ourselves to the Sovereign part (τὸ ἡγούμενον), for that is the part which decides (or wills)." He illustrates this by reference to the Homeric Constitutions in which the kings decided, and the common people merely carried out the will of their rulers. Mr. Marshall distorts this illustration by making the people "represent the appetitive side of choice." This is nonsense. The people in the illustration correspond to the limbs in the body. The limbs obediently carry out the Will of the personality which decides. The whole passage, so far from lending any support to Mr. Marshall's suggestion that τὸ ἡγούμενον is a word meaning will as distinguished from wish (p. 192), points all the other way. Had τὸ ἡγούμενον meant "that part of us which wills"—instead of meaning, as it does, simply "the Sovereign part of ourselves"—the addition, in Ethics 1113^a 5, of the words τοῦτο γὰρ τὸ προαιρούμενον would have been not merely unnecessary, but positively illogical.

We must also protest against the rendering (however orthodox) which Mr. Marshall favours of ἡ εἰς ἄλλα πρότασις in Ethics 1143^b 3. He renders this by "the minor proposition in the Practical Syllogism," meaning thereby, we presume, the minor premise. But the immediately succeeding words, "ἀρχαὶ γὰρ τοῦ οὗ ἐνεκα αὐταί," force upon us the conclusion that ἡ εἰς ἄλλα πρότασις here corresponds not to the minor premise but to the conclusion of the Practical Syllogism. A little reflection will show that it is from such conclusions, and not from minor premises, that "rules of conduct are generalised." It is, for instance, from a succession of immediate particular judgments of the form "this is wrong—that is wrong—and the other is wrong—" that there emerges in due time in consciousness an explicit general principle: "Acts of such and such a character are wrong." But these immediate particular judgments, if we insist on expressing them in terms of the Practical Syllogism, are conclusions rather than minor premises. Nor indeed is this the only passage in Aristotle in which "minor premise" is a misleading rendering of the words ἡ εἰς ἄλλα πρότασις.

And last—for we shall be glad to make an end of criticism—we seem to find in Mr. Marshall's treatment of Aristotle's conception of "natural justice" a singular misunderstanding, or indeed confusion. This conception Mr. Marshall regards as inconsistent with the doctrine that virtue is a habit, and therefore acquired.

Readers . . . will be surprised to find Aristotle in this chapter assuming the existence of a natural justice . . . of a justice which does not conform to that part of the definition of good conduct which asserts it to be a habit produced by repeated acts.

And immediately afterwards he remarks that Aristotle, not merely in the 5th book of the Ethics but also in the Rhetoric, suggests the existence of a completely developed virtue "as the result of an effort of nature and distinct from a virtue of the same kind as a result of habit." Now this is all a fiction of Mr. Marshall's imagination. So far as the Rhetoric is concerned, all that the passage on which he relies tells us is that, quite apart from the conventions of organised societies, there are certain elementary principles of justice which all men instinctively divine (ἐστὶν ὁ μαντεύονται τι πάντες φύσει κοινὸν δίκαιον). And the φυσικὸν δίκαιον of Eth. 1134^b 18 has not any other meaning. But what has all this to do with the doctrine that the virtues (justice no less than the rest) are not innate but acquired? δικαιοσύνη as a "completely developed virtue" is no instinct of divination, it is a habit of doing. The instinctive sense of the elementary principles of justice to which Aristotle refers in the Rhetoric would be no more than the raw material and potentiality of the virtue of justice.

The criticisms we have offered will have shown that we do not consider Mr. Marshall an interpreter of Aristotle whom it is always safe to follow. They are not, however, intended to weaken the judgment with which we began—that he has given us Aristotle in a readable form, and that his book will well repay perusal.

ART AND SCIENCE IN BUILDING DESIGN

Reason in Architecture. By T. G. JACKSON, R.A. (Murray, 10s. 6d. net.)

COMING from the pen of so careful a student and so accomplished an architect as Mr. Jackson, the essays which form this volume have a strong claim on the interest, not merely of architects and students, but of all who profess an intelligent admiration for the great buildings of our country. The book aims at proving a theory and pointing a moral—a theory of the development of style in Gothic architecture, and an application of the lessons derived from a survey of history to the design and method of the present day.

Mr. Jackson's theory, in brief, is that all the great changes of style have arisen not from the inspired imagination of great builders but from some practical or constructional necessity or convenience, a variation in the nature of the material available, a contrivance for economy, or a fresh experience gained in the statics of building, the distribution of weight and pressure. To the demonstration of this theory Mr. Jackson devotes nearly three-fourths of the book, and it is incontestable that he sets out his facts and his arguments with great skill and force. Beginning, for example, with the Corinthian capital of Roman date, he traces from it the gradual evolution of Byzantine and Gothic forms, as the trabeated yielded to the arched construction of the walling above the columns. And though the illustrations are chosen from a wide field, which stretches from Dalmatia to Normandy, Mr. Jackson's argument establishes a progressive development founded mainly on constructional motives. Nevertheless, it is admitted that this order of change with its slow gradations cannot be traced in English architecture, in which the Gothic burst from classic bonds with far more swiftness and vigour. From capital and impost Mr. Jackson passes to arch and pier, and shows how departure from Roman models was caused by the necessity of using smaller stones, and how this necessity led to the recessing of rings in arches and shafts in piers, and so to all the glories of clustered columns and sculptured doorways in our great cathedrals. Similarly, two most able chapters are devoted to a history of vaulting construction, which is traced from the Roman type, depending for stability on inert mass, to the Gothic, which secures stability by a balance of opposing forces. And not only the ribbed vaulting which adds much to the charm of Gothic interiors, but the whole system of clerestory, buttress, pinnacle, and flying buttress is proved to be based on what Mr. Jackson calls "reason" or "reasonableness," by which he really means science. For his whole thesis may be stated in other terms as follows: first, that underneath all changes of style there lies not a reason but a scientific reason; and next that this scientific reason preponderated over artistic reason in determining such changes.

It is an interesting question, and Mr. Jackson is not merely ingenious but clearly successful in proving that architecture is a science which has largely depended for its development on scientific laws. Yet one cannot help feeling that his case is somewhat overstated. The converse view of artistic inspiration—the view, for instance, that the Early English style was a pattern formed in the mind of a great builder before it was expressed in stone—is one which has some authority: Mr. Jackson thinks it wholly wrong. Yet architecture is an art as well as a science, and artistic genius must count for a good deal in its development. Originality of design is a strong factor in the production of great works, which owe their stability no doubt to scientific law, but their artistic excellence to the canons of taste and beauty in the designer's mind. And because a constructional advantage can be shown to have accompanied most, if not all, changes of style, does it follow that the constructional motive was antecedent to and predominant over the artistic? May not artistic impulse have suggested new problems to constructional science instead of merely accepting advances in construction as fresh data for exercises in embellishment? Unluckily the literary evidence which might furnish an answer to such questions is almost entirely wanting. But Mr. Jackson, after stating that the round arch was abandoned by twelfth-century builders with great reluctance and quoting the case of Vezelay to show that the pointed arch was forced upon them by constructional necessity, yet has to admit that in England "the pointed arch was adopted with something like enthusiasm." Take the case of St. Mary's, Shrewsbury, where the arches joining the nave pillars and those between aisle and transept are round; while the western arch, though springing from purely Norman engaged columns, is slightly pointed, and in the walling above the chancel arch, which is sharply pointed, are two round arches, each enclosing a pair of small pointed arches. The motive here seems clearly decorative, the pointed arches being used only in places of honour. Again, while Mr. Jackson, on his theory, explains the change from Early English to Decorated, he does not explain the change from Decorated to Perpendicular—a change very hard to account for on merely constructional grounds. The truth seems to be that in the formation of style, power of imagination, play of fancy, sense of beauty and of proportion are factors quite as real as regard for scientific laws: that the artistic and the scientific elements of style are inseparable: and that you cannot determine the proportions in which they have combined or should combine. How the hard facts of mechanics can be transfigured by the artistic imagination, Mr. Jackson himself shows in this brilliant passage:

It would surprise many people, as they stand in the silence of some great Gothic minster, whose ancient stones seem to have grown old in peaceful calm and slumberous quiet, if they were to realise the truth that so far from everything being at rest around them they were surrounded by mighty unseen forces engaged in active combat, thrusting and counter-thrusting one another in fierce encounter, a never-ending conflict that never slackens between antagonists that never tire, the high vaults striving to push the walls outwards but rebuffed by the flying buttresses which try to push them inwards; the aisle vaults doing their best to push the nave columns inwards, but unable to move them under the dead weight of the superstructure of triforium and clerestory which holds them down; the whole fabric struggling to burst itself asunder, but manfully resisted by the system of counter-vailing forces, which only bargain as a condition of success that their great parent buttresses outside shall stand like a rock, and give them a firm foot-hold from which to get a purchase. (Pp. 126-7.)

But beyond the writer's historical survey there lies his practical purpose: which is to show that as the great styles in the past arose:

not from arbitrary design or fancy but as consequence of rational and logical development from causes partly external and partly social, so at the present day our architecture will depend for its vitality upon its accommodation to the circumstances of to-day.

The reproduction of bygone styles, the conditions of which are also bygone, must be a failure: witness the mullioned sash-windows and sham half-timbering of suburban villas, and business houses supported on shop-fronts of thin glass—construction which deliberately cheats the eye and the mind. Changed conditions must be frankly recognised and design be based upon them, even to construction with iron. Classic and Gothic models should be studied for instruction, but not copied, though imitation of them has been preached by all the authorities and taught by all the writers of the last century. Mr. Jackson refers (p. 8) to Scott, Sharp, Ruskin and others as having set up the past as the only model for students of architecture: and again (p. 160) he says: "all the books on architecture were in the same story from Palladio to Chambers, and Chambers to Pugin," i.e., dealing only with the externals of style and severely governed by precedent. But is it possible that he has forgotten Fergusson? More than forty years ago Fergusson published his "History of Architecture" with a remarkable preface, in which views are advocated and even language used which coincide very closely with Mr. Jackson's:

Some men [says Fergusson] are becoming aware of the fact that archæology is not architecture, and would willingly see something done more reasonable than an attempt to reproduce the middle ages. . . . Architecture with most people is a mystery—something different from all other arts: and they do not see that it is and must be subject to the same rules and be practised in the same manner, if it is to be successful.

Again:

If people can only be induced to think seriously about it, I feel that they will be as much astonished at their present admiration of Gothic Town Halls and Hyde Park Albert Memorials as we are now at the Gothic fancies of Horace Walpole and men of his day.

All this might have been written by Mr. Jackson, who indeed describes the Gothic revival as "in Horace Walpole's hands not much more serious than Sir William Chambers's Chinese pagoda." Fergusson praises the Crystal Palace, as Mr. Jackson praises the front of King's Cross Station; and just as Fergusson calls the reproduction of Gothic a mere "masquerade like the Eglinton Tournament," so Mr. Jackson (p. 185) says: "The mere copyist is after all only playing at Classicism and Mediævalism . . . he is only masquerading." Clearly James Fergusson should be recognised by Mr. Jackson as holding up a light in the darkness. Space, however, forbids us to follow this part of the subject: we can only hope that architects will ponder the plea for what Fergusson calls "common sense," and Mr. Jackson "reason" as their guiding principle.

But before closing there are one or two slips to note. On p. 11 "motion" should be "motive," p. 17 "practise" should be "practice," p. 81 n. Cicero did not write "authoritas," p. 126 "downward" for "downward," and p. 184 "verbiage" seems wrongly used. It is to be hoped, too, that in another edition Mr. Jackson will give up capital letters and the female personification of architecture. "She is the most reasonable and logical of the Arts," and "her outward form, when she is in a healthy state" neither sound well nor look well in English. But it must be added that the book is in all ways a charming one, beautifully printed and bound, and as pleasant in form to handle and peruse as it is thoughtful and entertaining in matter.

A. J. BUTLER.

A QUIET LIFE

Augustus Austen Leigh. A Record of College Reform. By WILLIAM AUSTEN LEIGH. (Smith, Elder, 8s. 6d. net.)

MR. WILLIAM AUSTEN LEIGH has written the life of his brother, the late Provost of King's College, Cambridge, with just that modesty, unaffected loyalty, and absence of exaggeration, which befit his subject. He prefers to speak of himself as the editor rather than the author of the volume; but the book is, in fact, a careful and balanced study, not only of a character, but also of a critical epoch in the life of a college. "A Record of College Reform" is the sub-title; and it was the Provost's intimate connection during forty years with the transformation of King's, so Mr. Austen Leigh explains in the preface, that made the book a possibility. There never was a quieter or busier life than the Provost's; but it is not quiet and busy lives that give most materials for biography; and if the work which he accomplished in King's had not been of interest and importance in itself, it would have been difficult, without appearing to exaggerate, to write the life of Augustus Austen Leigh. He was not a man of genius, he was neither a great scholar nor a great preacher, he had no striking gift of talk or expression. But his was a nature on whose unselfish goodness and truth all who came into contact with him knew, beyond possibility of doubt, that they could entirely rely. It is difficult to explain in a picturesque or arresting manner the place which such a nature holds in life. It can only be said that all who knew Austen Leigh knew a good friend—a friend in whom thought of self or indifference or changeability had no part. It was inconceivable to those who had once known him that they could see him again without finding the same welcome, the same friendly interest as before. Unless he hold some position where work of a conspicuous kind is placed in his hands, a man of this character will not attract wide attention. But his friends will learn to realise that it is from natures like his that such words as goodness and unselfishness take their meaning; and they are not likely to think that men of whom that could be said are many or are likely to be.

Austen Leigh's life was of the simplest description. He was one of a distinguished succession of brothers (grand-nephews of Jane Austen), whose names for many years past have been household words at Eton and King's. Augustus entered college at Eton in 1852, preceded and closely followed by an elder and a younger brother, and in due course they passed to King's, where all three became Fellows under the old régime. As Fellow, Tutor, Vice-Provost and Provost, Augustus Austen Leigh remained at King's almost continuously for the rest of his life. The chapter covering the Eton years is contributed by Mr. Arthur C. James. That was a time in the life of the school which with all its anomalies and abuses and shortcomings had yet a certain heroic air, traditions of culture and freedom—upheld perhaps by few, but not lacking a liberal distinction—which a far more energetic and conscientious age does not always find easy to recapture! There is less than nothing of the sort to be said about King's up to that time. Eton had grown far beyond the intentions of her founder, and for many generations had lived in touch with the world. King's was equally different from the ideal of Henry VI., but instead of growing beyond had fallen below it. Between the great estates and the unique privileges, exempting it from all University examinations, which the College enjoyed, it had become a strange little backwater, cut off not merely from the world, but even from the rest of Cambridge. Practically what Henry VI.'s fine flight of zeal and imagination had produced was a system of life-pensions awarded yearly without examination to a few Eton boys! If an Eton Foundation Scholar happened to reach the top of the school and to succeed to a vacancy at King's before he was nineteen, he might spend the rest of his life, provided that he did not marry, in comfortable and uninterrupted meditation at Cambridge, without being confronted with another anxiety or another surprise until the day of his death. The age of nineteen is perhaps the age at which a life-pension appears most desirable, the key to freedom and fame. But the King's system had for the most part proved to be a key to nothing of the kind. The place lacked the spirit of learned refinement and dignity, and though it possibly had not stagnated to a greater degree than other small colleges, its wealth, its magnificent buildings, its position as the appanage of Eton, all combined to make it a more conspicuous case. Within the last sixty years a change, set on foot by a group of remarkable men, has passed so entirely over all this that the very legend of the old order hardly exists for the modern undergraduate. The College preserves a special affinity towards Eton, but it is an affinity of sentiment, not a jealous and exclusive tie; it has grown rapidly, it shares completely in the life of the University, it maintains a special standard of scholarship. It is gratifying for King's men to reflect that the long series of reforms which all this implies sprang from within—not imposed by a despotic Commission from outside, but evolved by members of the College itself. Among that early liberal band the two most striking personalities were William Johnson (Cory), who watched the changes from Eton, and Henry Bradshaw, University Librarian. Johnson was a man whose incisive genius, whose rare and varied character, can never perhaps be fully felt except by those who inherited, directly or indirectly, the traditions which he bequeathed to his followers. Bradshaw was cast in a less difficult mould: and the influence of his wide sympathy and wisdom, of his humorous and extraordinarily lovable nature, was thrown into the scale of reform. But much as King's owed to these great men, it was Augustus Austen Leigh above all who guided and finally carried out its regeneration. He became Tutor in 1868, at the age of twenty-seven, and from then until his death in 1905 he never wavered in his efforts to win for his College the place it now holds. His brother traces with concise clearness the complicated steps by which the emancipation was effected. They were far too many and too technical to detail here, and the full account will doubtless be of interest chiefly to King's men. But enough has been said to show the extent of the change of which the late Provost saw the beginning and the completion. He was, of course, met at first with plenty of opposition and obstruction, but his reconciling courtesy and profound common sense steadily made their way. Very early in his career all those who worked with or against him recognised him as a man whom they could trust, who would never go back upon a friend or try to over-reach an opponent, who never lost sight of what was just, and who was incapable of stooping to play for his own hand. He became Provost in 1889, and married in the same year Miss Florence Lefroy. For the next sixteen years the Lodge at King's was the centre of a friendly hospitality which many generations of undergraduates have good reason to remember gratefully. The Provost was not outspoken upon intimate subjects, nor did he ever take the line, always viewed by youth with suspicion, of "gaining influence" over the young. But no one of the innumerable friends who remember him as a familiar figure on the lawns of King's or in the huge Chapel, ever had a moment's reason to doubt his never-failing interest and affection. When he died, quite suddenly and with little pain, in January 1905, his loss was felt to a degree which would have surprised him, but could surprise no one else. There never was a wiser ruler of a College, a more humble-hearted man, a better friend, and of this only he himself was unaware.

THE MODERN HISTORIAN

Haddon: the Hall, its Lords and Traditions. By G. LE BLANC SMITH. With illustrations by the author. (Elliot Stock, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE majority of our readers will be familiar with the story of the discovery, by Sir Henry Maxwell-Lyte, who visited Belvoir Castle on behalf of the Historical Manuscripts Commission in 1885, of a vast mass of priceless manuscripts relating to Haddon Hall, in a loft over a stable.

No one [we quote Sir Henry's own account] had entered the room for some years; a curtain of cobwebs hung from the rafters, and the floor was so covered with documents, piled to a height of three or four feet, that at first there was scarcely standing room. Over everything there was a thick layer of broken plaster and dirt, which made white paper indistinguishable from brown.

A labourer was called in to assist in the manual work, and it soon became evident that the loft had been tenanted by rats, who had done lasting damage to valuable manuscripts by gnawing and staining them:

Some documents had been reduced to powder, others had lost their dates or their signatures. The entire centre of a long letter in the hand of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, had entirely disappeared. Those that remained were of a very varied character. A deed of the time of Henry II. was found among some granary accounts of the eighteenth century, and gossiping letters from the Court of Elizabeth among modern vouchers. Letters to Henry Vernon from the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, and Kings Edward IV., Richard III., and Henry VII., written on paper and folded very small, lay hidden between large leases engrossed on thick parchment.

Many of the deeds and documents were transcribed by Mr. W. A. Carrington and contributed to the Journal of the Derbyshire Archaeological Society, and the late Duchess of Rutland, Mr. Pym Yeatman and Mr. Llewellyn Jewitt have worked in the same field. Little more remained to be said, and Mr. Smith's beautifully illustrated book is, to some extent, a summary. He claims for it no originality, but we owe him a debt of gratitude for his attempt to dispose of the sentimental drivel which has grown up around the supposed elopement of Dorothy Vernon with John Manners and for the light he throws on points in the Haddon pedigree which have led former historians astray. Here our gratitude ceases: for the rest his book is a curious mixture of facts, jottings, errors and confusions; literary merit it has none.

The precise date of the building of Haddon Hall is unknown, but the Manor formed one of William the Conqueror's many gifts to William Peverel: he probably constructed part, and from his great grandson it passed to the Avenels. (When the fourth William Peverel, charged with poisoning Ranulph, Earl of Chester, forfeited his estates, Haddon Hall was not among the property inherited by the de Ferrars, who, presumably to show their disbelief in Peverel's guilt, discarded their armorial bearings—Argent, six horseshoes sable—and adopted his: Vairé, or and gules.) The earliest document among the Haddon muniments is an agreement between William Avenel and Richard de Vernon and Simon Basset, who married Avice and Elizabeth, his daughters and co-heiresses, in which the estate is divided between Vernon and Basset, the Hall itself going to Vernon. To Richard and Avice were born two sons, William and Robert, the former of whom married Margaret de Stockport, who bore him two sons, Richard and Robert. Both were banished, and the estate went to their cousin, Avice, the only daughter of the first Robert. She married a Gilbert le Franceis, and their son, Richard, adopted his mother's name. (It is this adoption of the name of Vernon which has led several historians astray and induced at least one of them to attempt to trace his descent from an imaginary son of William Vernon.) He married Isabel, daughter of Sir William Gernon of Blakewell, but his son, Richard, who married Maude, or Matilda, de Campville, appears to have predeceased him and the estate went to his grandson William. Whom he married is uncertain (it certainly was not Joan ap Griffith, as Mr. Llewellyn Jewitt claimed, since she married his grandson), but his son, Richard, was a distinguished soldier who married Juliana de Pembrugge, and thus acquired the valuable Manor of Tong. It was their son, another Richard, who married Joan ap Griffith, and the third Richard, Treasurer of Calais, Captain of Rouen, Speaker of the Leicester Parliament, and Steward of the Peak Forest, was perhaps the most noteworthy of the Vernons who followed, if we except the famous Sir George, who won—and merited—the title of "King of the Peak." By his first wife, Margaret Taylebois, Sir George had two daughters, Margaret and Dorothy, but there was no issue of the second marriage. Of the two daughters, Margaret, the elder, married Sir Thomas Stanley, and Dorothy (the "Sweet Doll of Haddon," "Dorothy o' the Hall," and so on) became the wife of John Manners, second son of the first Earl of Rutland. He was in every way a desirable husband, and there is no record of any difference ever having arisen between him and Sir George Vernon, on whose death he succeeded to Haddon Hall. The room in which Dorothy Vernon is said to have been dancing on the night of her elopement and the steps down which she fled into the arms of her expectant lover (we beg pardon for the lapse into sentimentality) were not built at the time of her marriage, and in point of fact she did not elope at all.

Mr. le Blanc Smith has interesting and informative chapters on the tapestry, furniture, etc., but they do not strike us—we may be wrong—as being based on first-hand knowledge. We must protest very strongly against the author's habit of introducing matter of his own into quotations; thus, in an inventory dated 1639, we have:

A longe spoone (not for "supping with the devil," we hope).

It may be very funny, an exquisite jest, but this kind of humour should be relegated to the foot-notes. It is not the only instance of irritating interjections: we could cite twenty. Again, a number of cheap sneers such as those on pages 82 and 93 might well have been omitted, and the interjections on pages 150 and 154 are merely vulgar. For whom does our author think he is writing when he deems it necessary to add to the item "payd for an Accidence" in the selections from the "Steward's [sic] Accounts 1549-1671," a note to the effect that "Accidence book" means "a little book containing the first principles of the Latin tongue"? Three pages further on is a note to the word "tafitie"—"Taffeta, a sort of thin lace." Mr. Smith may buy a taffeta shirt at Messrs. So-and So's in Burlington Arcade which he will discover to be by no means "a sort of thin lace." On the word "vellvett" the author is illuminating. It means, he explains, "velvet." If a second edition of this book should be called for he might do well to revise sentences such as: "The fine was ultimately reduced to £10,000, thanks to the endeavours of Sir Robert Cecil, who might very well have done the reverse;" and "Mr. Llewellyn Jewitt makes the terrible mistake of taking Sir George Vernon as brother of Henry Vernon (owner of Sudbury) whereas he was his cousin, being son of his (Sir George's) father's brother John, who married Helen Montgomery;" and so on. On page 15 there is an absolute contradiction on line 11 of a statement made on lines 1 and 2; on the same page "care" should be "case"; in the pedigree on page 4 "de Franceis" should be "le Franceis"; in the same pedigree we have "Havis de Vernon" though in three other pedigrees she is given as "Avice" and she is Avice in the text; and on page 16 we read (of Juliana de Pembrugge): "Juliana de Vernon, after the death of her second husband, Richard de Vernon, retired into seclusion, seeking refuge in a convent." Her first husband was the Vernon mentioned, her second Sir Thomas de Wennesley. We have not space to point out more of the errors in the book. We shall keep it on our shelves—for its illustrations.

IN JOURNEYINGS OFTEN

Hakluytus Posthumus, or Purchas His Pilgrimes. In twenty volumes. Vols. xiii. and xiv. (MacLehose, 12s. 6d. net each.)

THE documents which Samuel Purchas was at such pains to collect are no longer, we are inclined to fear, as essential to the proper outfit of a traveller to the North Pole or the West Indies as they were some three hundred years ago or as Baedeker's packed books are now. Even Captain Cook has been replaced by another Cook. Time has robbed Purchas's work of its intrinsic value and endowed it with unspeakable charm. These two of the twenty large comely volumes in which Purchas makes the world's discoverers write "the history of the world in sea voyages and lande travells" contain records of voyages to the far North to search for the North-western passage, or to get oil or morse's teeth, and always to find adventure. They contain also a long account of Russia and "the occurrences of principall note which happened in the time while the Honorable Sir Thomas Smith remained there Embassadour from his Majestie." Of this Sir T. Smith, Stowe chronicles that "he became so gracious with the Emperor that he fully obtained whatsoever he desired." And both Stowe and Purchas exclaim at Russian affairs with as much justice as the modern journalist exclaims to-day:

And now Russia blushed with impudencie, that is with shamelesse sight of the daily effusion and profusion of her best blood; now every man was an Actor: and oh had they beene but Actors! too really did they present (not represent) bloudie Tragedies, of which their whole Countrey was become the Theatre; the Devil the Choragus (a Murderer from the beginning) and the whole World Spectator, stupid with admiration, quaking with horror of so uncouth a sight!

That was in 1612: in 1906 the world still stares in horror.

But Russian confusion occupies only a small part of the volumes, which deal chiefly with the voyages of Thomas Edge, of Robert Fotherby, of Jonas Poole, of Josias Logan, of Arngrim Jones, who wrote about the Goths, and of the famous Henry Hudson, who left his name to far-off bays. For the most part the accounts are naïf log-books, though Arngrim Jones was learned in the strange language of Ulfilas, and Henry Hudson had something of great Raleigh's width of outlook. They dropped down the Thames from Blackwall, past Greenwich and Gravesend, and set sail for the white unknown, to lands inhabited by bears and morse. They named the coves and hills of these lands after themselves or in memory of some exploit or misadventure; and if they came upon other men they pointed to their flag of possession and regarded them as intruders upon themselves and the great bears and little foxes and the ice and the fog and the snow. Their own ingenuity was pitted against the elements of unknown lands and little-known seas. They knew less than a boy knows now who has read his Ballantyne. They struggled desperately, and gave thanks quietly to God when the ice did not crush their boats to atoms and the fogs lifted before their ships drifted aground. And they would come back, year after year, to the island which had become their own by discovery, as Jonas Poole used to come back to Cherie Island, leaving London in April and returning towards the end of August, and perhaps find again their own traces—boats and rough shelters, which some previous year they had used and abandoned, and which must have filled them with a thrilling sense of proprietorship. Jonas Poole could not resist telling of each bear he saw or wounded or killed. Bears worked a subtle fascination over him: bears obsessed him. On one occasion he landed with his men and at once espied three bears, two of whom walked away, but the third stood still champing and foaming as though he would have eaten us. . . . I let the angry devill come within two Pikes lengths and gave him such a welcome that he fell down stone dead.

They proceeded farther and found the shallop which they had left the year before, and sat down to eat a little food; however:

wee were no sooner set to eat than there came a Beare with two young ones as big as Lambes of a moneth old: they skipped about their dams necke and played with one another very wantonly.

Jonas shot at the dam but missed her, though she came very near, and the flint of his musket broke and prevented him slaying the next he saw, which a friend shot in the foot; but he was consoled by seeing soon another huge Beare fast a sleep on the Snow. I went softly towards him and gave him such a flip that he never rose out of the place where he lay.

This makes capital reading, and it is not likely that the stories of their adventures lost spice in the telling when the sailors were spending autumn and winter evenings in London taverns; and their tales would fire the imaginations of the listeners, who would not know what to believe and what not to believe where all was marvellous and new. Thomas Hilles and Robert Rayner, two of Henry Hudson's company, actually saw a mermaid. Thomas saw her first and called to Robert Rayner, and they both looked at her, for by that time shee was come close to the ships side, looking earnestly on the man: a little after a Sea came and overturned her: . . . her back and breasts were like a womans (as they say that saw her) her body as big as one of us; her skin very white, and long haire hanging down behind, of colour blacke: in her going down they saw her tayle which was like the tayle of a Porposse and speckled like a Macrell.

And all would agree that in those lands the sun did not go down for weeks together, and that the sound of the cracking ice was loud as the crash of artillery. No wonder that the poets found inspiration in the London taverns, and that men lived almost in the streets where at any moment they might meet some fellow with a new tale of the world's wonder, that might very likely be true.

TWO ASPECTS OF FLORENTINE HISTORY

The Florentine History. By NICCOLÒ MACCHIAVELLI. Translated by N. H. THOMSON. 2 vols. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

The Guilds of Florence. By EDGUMBE STALEY. (Methuen, 16s. net.)

THE changes which in our time have come over the methods and ideals of history could scarcely find a better illustration than that afforded by a comparison of these two works. Both deal mainly with the history of Florence in the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, but the ground they cover is so different, and their point of view is so unlike, that, were it not for an occasional mention of the same facts and a rather more frequent occurrence of the same names, they would seem to describe two civilisations, separated widely alike by time and distance. Of the two books, Mr. Staley's is that which explains Florence to a modern reader, and without some such study Macchiavelli's narrative is but half intelligible. The modern work of research results in a collection of facts of which, in the day and in the country of the Medicean writer, some were too well known to need explanation, while the rest had been forgotten and their importance for historical purposes was not recognised. The space which Macchiavelli devotes to home affairs is chiefly taken up by bloody riots, feuds, personal ambitions and revenges, and sudden changes in the government; while the greater part of his book is a chronicle of mock-heroic warfare waged by hired captains and mercenary soldiers, the intrigues of Popes and princes, and the ever-changing leagues and alliances between Milan, Naples, Florence, Rome, Genoa and Venice. The part which Florence sustained in these international wranglings and peace-makings was but an outcome of her inner life and development. Her foreign affairs were managed for her by a few citizens deputed to act as ambassadors, or by the mercenary leaders whom she employed. To engage in a war or to make a peace was a question of money, not of the lives of the citizens, who stayed at home carrying on their business. Consequently, money being plentiful in Florence, the chief thing to be dreaded from complications abroad was that the unsuccessful issue of some war or embassy might cause dissatisfaction and dissensions, and the citizens take sides and shed each other's blood. The costly wars in which Florence took part, and to a large extent her internal conspiracies and revolutions, must now sink into comparative insignificance, for they affected her life merely as disturbances and hindrances to its peaceful development. We shall seek the true history of the Renaissance in Florence in the rise of prosperity and republican liberty under the Guilds, and in the increase of riches and the gradual loss of liberty as the Medici became more important and the Guilds less powerful.

That Florence and the Guilds of Florence were at one time one and the same thing is apparent immediately from one or two considerations. Not only did commercial life give proof of its stability by continuing on its course little touched by revolution and war, but it was practically impossible for a Florentine to rise to any eminence owing to his personal position. Everything must be attained through the guilds. Early in the history of the city the commons began to restrict the powers of the nobles, until by 1343 the nobles were entirely excluded from any share in the government. A curious instance of the subjection of the Nobili by the commons is to be found in one of the articles in the code of the guild of Bankers and Money-changers. It enacts that if any noble of the city or contado of Florence should "presume to enter unasked the residences or offices of the Guild," he would be fined ten lire and not set at liberty until the whole fine had been paid. Imagine the astonishment of the grantees of Venice if they had been brought face to face with a democracy of this temper! Afterwards many noble Florentine families, in order to recover their lost position, renounced their titles and became enrolled as members of one or another of the guilds. The guilds appointed the Podestà and the Gonfaloniere, the heads of the State, together with all the councils and committees. The judges were not merely controlled by the guilds, but were themselves enrolled as a guild, together with the notaries, and were subject to the same limitations and surveillance as the merchant-guilds. The landed gentry of the Contado, in order to sell the wine made on their estates, had to become members of the Guild of Wine Merchants. Most of the famous painters, sculptors, poets, historians and scholars were members of the guilds. Dante, as is well known, was a member of the Guild of Doctors and Apothecaries, and was a Prior in 1300; Luca della Robbia held office in the same guild upwards of thirty times; while we find that in 1281 Brunetto Latini, famous as scholar and sinner, brought before the Signoria a proposal to appoint inspectors whose duty should be to detect frauds on the part of the retailers of meat and fish! Another side-light on Dante may be mentioned here. It will be remembered that in Inferno xvii. Dante says he could not recognise the faces of the usurers whom he saw in that circle, but that each had hanging from his neck a purse, or pouch, of a certain shape or colour, with arms painted upon it. This is no mere artifice on the part of Dante, as some have thought, to vary his method of recognising the people of the lower world, but it refers to a well-established custom in old Florence, whereby men used to wear a leather pouch, the shape of which denoted the guild to which they belonged, while on the front might be shown either the arms of the wearer's family or those of his guild.

Mr. Thomson's version of the Storie Fiorentine is in all important respects to be commended, as it is both readable and accurate. The chief criticism we have to offer is that, especially at the beginning of the book, there is some attempt at writing in an archaic manner, which does not harmonise at all well with very modern phrases to be found later on. The writer who uses the expression "factious humours" surprises us unpleasantly when he says afterwards that "the Cerchi decided to have it out with the Donah." The phrase, "one man, who may be disabled by obstruction or removed by death" is awkward. And is it fair to the memory of Lorenzo de' Medici to represent him as having said: "I have more enemies in this city than I had thought for"?

Mr. Staley has done so much good work that it is a thousand pities he should have added to his book pages and pages of writing which is both valueless and unworthy. The work of research has been carried out patiently and conscientiously. An account is given of each Guild, its origin, constitution, development and decline. In these chapters we read of the officers of the Guilds, their codes, the rules by which employers and workmen were bound, and those regulating prices, conditions of sale, export and import. The author also gives a good many technical details of the processes employed by some of the guilds, for instance the Guild of Wool and of the Calimala, or foreign cloth merchants. The work is beautifully illustrated by numerous plates reproducing old prints, pictures, miniatures and carvings, an especial feature being supplied by photographs of the della Robbia work. Many chapters strongly impress the reader with Mr. Staley's grasp of his subject and his recognition of the comparative importance of its various ramifications. In fact, so long as he is giving us information we have no word for him but thanks. But why will he persist in trying to "write up" his subject? It did not need it, and, what is more, the author cannot do it. The inevitable opening and concluding paragraphs, vapid, feeble, sometimes nonsensical, and the wildly metaphorical eulogies of Florence and her famous citizens, contribute a good deal to the size and weight of a volume already huge and heavy, but to its interest, nothing at all. The following sentence, for instance, represents no thought, but is merely inserted to lead up to a few remarks on Leather: "As to who first wore coverings on the feet nobody knows, and probably nobody cares; but no age and no nation has ever been without them." Why, God 'a mercy, fellow, if the second part of the sentence be true, then the answer to the question contained in the first is obvious, namely, the first man of the first nation of the first age. Of what use, too, is a sentence like the following:

The Men of Letters of the Renaissance, whose sun rose and shone in Florence, form a paradise of celebrities which have placed the Fair City upon the premier throne of the Valhalla of Learning.

There are many paragraphs and pages which do no more towards advancing the subject than the two sentences we have quoted. The reader is constantly worried by inaccurate citations of Italian words and phrases, while Dante, who is constantly referred to, is never quoted but always represented by translations which can only be called ridiculously bad. It is with real regret that we find a work of so much intrinsic worth defaced by the inclusion of so much which is unnecessary and irritating to read.

THE UNCLASSED

Glimpses into the Abyss. By MARY HIGGS. (King & Son, 3s. 6d.)

FOR many years Mrs. Higgs has been earnestly and actively interested in tramp life—the causes of vagrancy, the temptations to it, its miseries, and their daily aggravation by official ignorance and a neglect that runs to positive cruelty. Eager for reform, she has not been content with such an understanding of the matter as may be drawn from official statistics, or from the unceasing supply of information gathered by journalistic enterprise and reported with journalistic emphasis. Starting with but one half-crown in her pocket, she has spent days on the tramp with tramps, nights in the casual wards of workhouses, and other days and nights in common lodging-house dens, not excluding such as are the haunts of the most degraded prostitution. These investigations she thought necessary to a right comprehension of "the root problems of poverty," and to their solution by the grand desideratum, scientific method. So far there has been no attempt at scientific method, or at any rate no published discovery of anything of the kind. But Mrs. Higgs thinks a scientific mode of treatment achievable, if inquiry into the facts be accompanied by "investigation into deterioration of human personality, viewed from the psychological, medical, and religious points of view." By how much Mrs. Higgs would claim to have cleared the way to scientific treatment by these means we are uncertain. But this much may be said—the statistics are here in full force, and though we do not find in her pages much aid from psychological, medical, and religious study, aids they certainly are; while as for inquiry, as for experiential investigation of the facts of the matter as they exist to-day, we are almost inclined to doubt whether there are two other women in England who would have carried it so far or repeated it so often as did Mrs. Higgs and the companion of her loathsome adventures. As these adventures are here described—that is to say with a detail which stops at nothing short of the absolutely unspeakable—the wonder is that they could be endured more than once by such investigators; nor, indeed, does there seem to have been any necessity for continuing them so often. We say this the more confidently because, when the outlines of the common lodging-house life and the life on tramp are drawn, and when they are touched in here and there with a significant hint (and that has been done a hundred times in the last twenty years) the worst details are at once understood: we know what they are by knowing what they must be. There is no need to describe them in print: certainly no need to describe them in all their naked offensiveness three times over. We do not know, however, that we should have urged this criticism against Mrs. Higgs's book were it not likely to be taken into general lending-library reading, or if its descriptions had been confined to the hardships and horrors of casual wards and "doss-houses." But that is not the case. The persistent reader of this book, whoever he or she may be, will spend two or three days and nights in a sixpenny lodging-house populated by the lowest and foulest women of the town: and here he (or she) will become acquainted with all the detail of their lives, habits, and conversation, short of the absolutely unspeakable. Of what service are these pages likely to be for those who are either learned or unlearned in the subject? A more unprofitable, unedifying superfluity of nastiness can hardly be conceived, no matter into whose hands the book is likely to fall. Yet we cannot end without expressing a very sincere regret at being compelled to make these remarks, so generous are the author's intentions and so willing has she been to endure the most odious sacrifice of feeling in endeavouring to carry them out.

WOMEN'S WORK

Women's Work and Wages. By EDWARD CADBURY, M. CÉCILE MATHESON and GEORGE SHANN. (Unwin, 6s.)

THREE out of the four aims which the writers of this book set before themselves have been successfully accomplished. They have succeeded in giving a wide and interesting survey of the conditions of women's work in Birmingham, and thus in enabling the progress towards future improvement to be measured. And they have also dealt, as far as possible in the space, with the question: "To what extent the present industrial and social conditions are helping forward or retarding the physical, mental and moral condition of the workers." Their views on the latter point are based on considerable experience and will certainly be useful to all whose zeal for industrial reforms is in need of definite guidance.

But the chief importance of the book consists in the mass of facts it contains, many of which are little known to the outside world. For instance, the widespread belief that men and women workers are two competing groups is shown to be on the whole groundless; the branches in which they are employed are mostly different. And, again, the assumption that, since women are largely dependent on men, their wages are low because "auxiliary" is confronted by the fact that in Birmingham in almost every trade the married women get higher wages than the unmarried. The overcrowded state of the market for women's work appears to be the result partly of the desire of the better class of girls for the kind of trade which offers decent surroundings, partly of the various causes which tend to make women less skilled, and partly of their failure to combine. It is satisfactory to find that places where cleanliness and order of person and language are demanded are popular with girls and that they show an ardent desire to "keep themselves respectable." In spite of this, however, many of them drift into the first trade suggested, without knowing much about its conditions; and often they are driven to choose an inferior one because the better trades entail an apprenticeship of months or even years, and during the apprenticeship merely a "pocket-money wage." Naturally also the expectation of marriage interferes to some extent with a girl's energy in learning her trade, and so tends to keep her unskilled. On the whole it is a gloomy view that is given of the present condition of women's work in Birmingham, and the completeness of its detail will be of great service to reformers in search of material.

The fourth aim of the writers, as stated in the introduction, is to indicate upon what lines they think reformers will obtain the best results in their attempt to raise and brighten the lives of those who are the future mothers of the race.

Here their success is less complete. It is, perhaps, too much to ask that those who have the interests of wage-earners deeply at heart should altogether escape the anti-capitalist bias which so often distorts or obscures economic theory and prevents any far-seeing view of industrial causes and effects. Yet we cannot help thinking that this blemish rather excessively pervades some parts of the book. When it is a question merely of providing lavatories, ventilation, girls' clubs or classes, of shortening work-time, or improving the special rules for dangerous trades, the reader's sympathy is entirely on the side of the authors of the book; their proposals seem based on knowledge.

It is difficult, however, to accept in the same spirit suggestions arising out of the half-true assumptions and shallow generalisations which the older and more abstract theory allows the wage-earner to make or interpret in his own favour. When, for instance, the factors of production are crudely distinguished as "Land, Labour, and Capital," when such factors as enterprise, foresight, organisation, employers' industry, are left out of account, it is easy to draw all sorts of false conclusions. Thus, in the chapter on Wages the old assumption is made that Labour and Capital are related only as a pair of dogs fighting for a bone—namely, for the largest possible share of "the national dividend"; and that Labour is the relatively weak dog, who therefore fails to get his fair share. It is apparently taken for granted that we can know by instinct what is a fair or normal share, for we do not find this perplexing but important question raised, though the proposal to cut the knot by enforcing a "minimum wage" is favoured in another chapter. But as things now are it is assumed that the labourer's fighting disability as against the capitalist is itself sufficient evidence that his share of the product must be an unfair one. And it does not seem to have occurred to the writer that, since the disability consists precisely in the fact that the labourer is not a capitalist, the only remedy would be either to turn him into one or else to turn the capitalist into a wage-earner. In the latter case it is not clear who would be entrusted with the important functions now performed by the employer of labour, though a vague hope of something like the nationalisation of capital seems suggested in the concluding chapter. It is easy, on paper, to throw all our real difficulties into that convenient receptacle, the State.

Again, in another place, by means of the same insufficient analysis, the conclusion is reached (p. 302) that :

of the joint product of these factors the owners of capital and land, though comparatively very few in number, take an enormous share ;

and that consequently the main problem is to be solved by the simple process of squeezing "Profits" till the desires of the wage-earner are satisfied ; and though it is true enough that "no one has a moral right to use a man or woman merely as a means of producing wealth," and quite possible that "the end of work should be to develop and humanise the life of the worker," the really important question is how such aphorisms are to be applied, or such ideals to be approached in practice. Merely by themselves, and in virtue of their own inherent excellence, they do not allow us straight away to assume that in given cases profits can be lowered without depressing the trade as a whole and therefore curtailing employment. The question is what can actually be done, not merely what would be ideally desirable. For we all agree that extreme poverty, and extreme luxury, are blots on our civilisation ; what we want to know is how they may be abolished or mitigated. For this purpose it is well to study the conditions of labour as they really are, and not to accept unquestioned the partial view which is natural to the impatient sympathiser with suffering. The value of this book consists in its contribution to such a study, and its defect consists in its occasional disregard of facts and difficulties that should be faced by any sound economic theory.

CANADA'S FIGHT FOR LIBERTY

The Canadian War of 1812. By C. P. LUCAS, C.B. (Clarendon Press, 12s. 6d. net.)

THERE are some civil servants who retire and write dull memoirs, there are others who take an interest in their profession and write, while still on the active list, for the edification and enjoyment of their countrymen. Mr. C. P. Lucas, already known as a keen exponent of colonial history and geography, is happily one of the latter and more useful class. With an inside knowledge of the Colonial Office, he has been able to approach the subject of the Canadian War of 1812 to great advantage : the result of his labours is, though not free from defects, a splendid instalment of Canadian history. The war, as the national war of Canada, is of great importance to those who study colonial history : it was, as Mr. Lucas says, "at once the supplement and the corrective of the American War of Independence." It became of importance, because it illustrated the failure of men who had once been citizens of the British Empire to subdue other British colonists turning their frontier and facing their settlements. That it has been comparatively ignored by historians, in England at any rate, is due chiefly to the accident of time when it was waged.

Its incidents were to Englishmen completely overshadowed by the far more glorious record of the Peninsula and Waterloo. The last thing in the world that the British government and the British people desired in the midst of their sore trial and distress was this additional war with the United States of America. They were loath to enter into it. They were glad to be quit of it ; and they willingly tried to forget it, not least because, while it lasted, the British navy—Nelson's own navy—had distinctly lost reputation.

The war is remembered most because of the fight between the Shannon and the Chesapeake, an incident very briefly described in this book, and it deserves to be studied because of its amphibious character. The water communications in the main scene of fighting give to the operations their chief military interest ; but from the point of view of colonial history the war was of greater interest.

This latter aspect is described by Mr. Lucas very clearly and well : he has done what Kingsford in his history of Canada hoped to do. Mr. Lucas would have us study the war also because "in no war were the merits and defects of citizen soldiers more clearly to be seen, or the priceless value in the early stages of such a war of a nucleus of trained men." The facts may be as thus stated, but unfortunately Mr. Lucas writes of the political events in one way and the military in another. We need read no more than half a dozen pages to discover that the author is a civilian. Infantry regiments have no "flags" ; the 49th is not now the Berkshire regiment but the first battalion of that regiment, and the 41st is not the Welsh regiment but the first battalion of that regiment. It may be urged that these are small details : that they are, but they show better than longer examples that Mr. Lucas is not a military historian. We are grateful to him for the maps, reproduced from a volume published in 1813, but battle-plans, based on the known facts, would have made the history more intelligible.

'IN MEMORIAM' AND 'THE DOOR OF HUMILITY'

THE readers of the ACADEMY owe thanks to the editor for drawing their attention, in the issue of August 4, to Mr. Mallock's acute and attractive paper in the National Review on Tennyson's "In Memoriam" and the present Laureate's "Door of Humility." The subject of both is largely the same—the efforts of a poet assailed with doubts to find some foothold for faith. Mr. Mallock tries to show that in dealing philosophically with the problem Mr. Austin is far the more successful. We do not hold this opinion, but we do not propose to discuss the question here. The article, however, is very stimulating and suggestive, and we heartily recommend it to our readers. The part of it which offends us is his comparison of the two poets as executants. In mastery of technique Tennyson is the peer of Milton. Mr. Austin is often so careless as to justify the attribution to him of the term "slipshod." Mr. Mallock admits carelessness, but he has not adverted to many of the most slovenly and formless passages in "The Door of Humility." He directs our attention to one very beautiful verse, which we do not apologise for quoting again :

The fluttering of the fallen leaves
Dimples the leaden pool awhile ;
So Age impassively receives
Youth's tale of troubles with a smile.

This is a delicately expressed thought, a little marred by the last line, which is too closely packed. This is a characteristic defect in the Laureate's muse. Some of his verses are nearly as hard to read aloud as Browning's :

Draughts dregwards loose tongues tied ;

For instance,

Around me ; fixedly shine the stars

and

The eyes of yashmaked odalisques.

But there are other offences far more serious. Can Mr. Mallock have overlooked a gross violation of grammar in the use of "lay" as a transitive verb instead of "laid" :

Borne by that tearful Mother whom,
Nigh unto Ostia's shelving sand,
Augustine lay in lonely tomb
Ere sailing for his Afric land.

We should like to know how Mr. Mallock would construe :

Nor like to those that cross the main
To wander witless in strange land,
Hearing unmastered tongues, disdain
The speech they do not understand.

The only theory we can form is that, by a vulgar error, Mr. Austin used "like" for "as." We sometimes hear in talk the atrocity "Like I did."

We are unable to parse "begin" in

Yet whence came Life, and how begin?
Rolleth the globe by choice or chance?

and we find the same difficulty with "be" in the last line of the following verse :

Yet if one's upward gaze could be
But stationed where the planets are,
The star were restless as the sea,
The sea be tranquil as the star.

The metre is well handled, as a rule; but there are flaws, as in

That bade the land appear and bring Forth herb and leaf, both fruit and flower, where the divorce of "bring" from "forth" is intolerable to the ear. Again, we have

The worm and me He also made where the meaning demands "me also."

In Monica's letter we find

When did your singing voice awake, though there is no interrogation, and the meaning is "awoke." So

The Pagan gods can help us not for "cannot help us." On p. 82 there is a piece of gross carelessness, where

My will withstand is printed, though the rhyme demands

Withstand my will;

and surely "that" should be "than" in the first line of stanza ix. p. 138.

We have laboured in vain to find the point of the simile in :

Godhead, withal, remains the same,
And Art embalms its symbols still;
As Poets, when athirst for Fame,
Still dream of Aganippe's rill.

Will some reader of the ACADEMY lighten our darkness?

Comparatives like "more large," "more great," "more old" offend the ear when the monosyllabic adjective is a common and unambitious word; not so when the word has some colour in it, as in Milton's

The bitter change
Of fierce extremes, extremes by change more fierce.

The poet is not often guilty of bathos, but sometimes he can hardly be acquitted of that sin :

They scan, they prate, they marvel why
The figures still expressive glow,
Oblivious they were painted by Adoring Fra Angelico.

Sometimes we have a Latinism such as may often be met in Coventry Patmore, whose influence on the Laureate is quite perceptible :

The belfry strikes the silvery hour,
Announcing her propinquity.

As we have been looking only for faults, perhaps we may draw attention to two beautiful passages :

Rain, wind, and rain. The writhing lake
Scuds to and fro to scape their stroke :
The mountains veil their heads, and make
Of cloud and mist a wintry cloak.

Through where the arching pinewoods make
Dusk cloisters down the mountain side,
The loosened avalanches take
Valeward their way, with death for guide,

And toss their shaggy manes and fling
To air their foam and tawny froth,
From ledge and precipice bound and spring,
With hungry roar and deepening wrath ;

Till, hamlet homes and orchards crushed,
And, rage for further ravin stayed,
They slumber, satiated, husht,
Upon the ruins they have made.

I rise from larch-log hearth, and, lone,
Gaze on the spears of serried rain,
That faster, nigher, still are blown,
Then stream adown the window pane.

The peasant's goatskin garments drip,
As home he wends with lowered head,
Shakes off the drops from lid and lip,
Then slinks within his châlet shed.

The cattle bells sound dull and hoarse,
The boats rock idly by the shore ;
Only the swollen torrents course
With faster feet and fuller roar.

Mournful, I shape a mournful song,
And ask the heavens, but ask in vain,
"How long, how long?" Ah! not so long
As, in my heart, rain, wind, and rain.

These fine stanzas are somewhat marred by the last, which could easily be ridiculed. The second passage has an intolerable hyperbaton in "deem they" for "they deem" in the fourth verse :

How blest, when organ concords swell,
And anthems are intoned, are they
Who neither reason nor rebel,
But meekly bow their heads and pray.

And such the peasants mountain-bred,
Who hail to-day with blithe accord
Her Feast Who to the Angel said,
"Behold the handmaid of the Lord!"

Downward they wind from pastoral height,
Of hamlet grouped round shattered towers,
To wend to shrine more richly dight,
And bring their gift of wilding flowers ;

Their gifts, their griefs, their daily needs,
And lay these at Her statue's base,
Who never, deem they, intercedes
Vainly before the Throne of Grace.

Shall I, because I stand apart,
A stranger to their pious vows,
Scorn their humility of heart,
That pleads before the Virgin Spouse,

Confiding that the Son will ne'er,
If in His justice wroth with them,
Refuse to hearken to Her prayer
Who suckled Him in Bethlehem?

Mr. Mallock has pointed out many instances of distorted order of words, some worse than any which we have noted. We do not accuse him of being too lenient to a slovenliness which must be very offensive to his fastidious ear. But we protest against the absurdity of affecting to hold the balance between the most perfect executant among the British poets and one who, however graceful and fascinating at times, is capable of giving to the world from the Laureate's chair such clumsy work as that of which we have given examples.

WHITE NIGHTS

THE quiet moonlight making
A silence dear and deep
For the sleep that half is waking
And the waking that half is sleep;

White nights when the spirit-places
And the wonder-ways are trod,
And the raptured soul embraces
The Kingdom and Heart of God.

DOROTHY FRANCES GURNEY.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

AGAINST CERTAIN OF OUR POETS

Quam opinionem magni errores consecuti sunt: quos auxerunt poetæ.

CICERO, Tusc. Quest., lib. i. 16.

Totaque de ratione humationis unum tenendum est; ad corpus illam pertinere, sive occiderit animus, sive vigeat; in corpore autem perspicuum est, vel extincto animo, vel elapso, nullum residere sensum.

CICERO, Tusc. Quest., lib. i. 43.

"EVERYTHING is spoilt by use," Keats declared in his plea for the enlargement of the Fancy, and this sweeping assertion perhaps nowhere encloses more truth than when applied to metaphor and simile. "Spoilt" seems, indeed, scarcely a strong enough word for the process of deterioration which here often occurs. Of course not by any means invariably. It may be all very well that a metaphor should expand itself into an apologue; very harmless that a simile should condense itself into a new dictionary word, though even this does argue a certain amount of preliminary triteness and damnable iteration. Still the tendency is as a rule a thing to be guarded against. We should "ever let the Fancy roam," but bear in mind that she is by nature a vagrant, and must be kept moving on. If she takes up her abode permanently anywhere in particular, or so much as loiters there over-long, it is probably with felonious intent. And similes and metaphors, being essentially Fancy-bred, inherit their parent's qualities. They are like the thistledown, a trifle light almost as the air on which it floats, a pretty and innocent-looking sort of furbelow to adorn the sunshine of late-summer days, yet possessing properties that, should the dainty white tuft descend, manifest themselves later in a stubborn, prickly, very reprehensible shape. More aptly, perhaps, they might be likened to the watercress, which we know as a wholesome, and to some tastes agreeable, garnish of our bread-and-butter, yet which beneath the too kindly skies of the Antipodes has unlearned its humble creeping habits, and, waxen hugely, has taken upon itself to turn awry the currents of strong-flowing rivers. For it has happened not once or twice in the story of humanity that very important streams of thought and action have been given their set through the ages by nothing more nor less than an over-grown figure of speech.

Ancient and obvious among these is the likening of death to sleep. At first, no doubt, it may have been rather an identification than a comparison, while mortal men were slow to learn that there was a difference not alone of degree but of kind between the two states. In fact they can hardly be said even to have thoroughly mastered the lesson; and the charge now brought against certain of our poets is connected with such a failure, though merely a small modern instance of it.

As old as the hills, of course, or at least as the hill-folk, is a belief that dead bodies retain personality and sense, and not only so, but that their proprietors by some mysterious law have a conscious existence simultaneously both in and out of them, "double-lived in regions new."

Here a locus classicus is the well-known Homeric passage where we find the souls of mighty heroes sent to Hades, while they themselves, their corpses namely, become a prey to dogs and fowls:

πολλὰς δ' ἰφθίμους ψυχὰς Ἄϊδι προΐαψεν ἡρώων, αὐτοὺς δὲ ἐλώρια τεύχε κύνεσσιν οἰωνοῖσι τε πᾶσι—

Nor need we go back all the way to the tale of Troy town for examples of this strange mental confusion. A couple of thousand years later, Claudio in Measure for Measure when suddenly confronted with his latter end, gives wild and whirling words to his apprehensions that although he goes he knows not whither, he may at the same time lie in cold obstruction, and bathe in fiery floods, a view which, albeit more dolorous in details, does not essentially differ from that of pre-historic Hellas. Again, there is nothing distinctively modern in the assumption that death does not really part soul from body, and that they are buried together. We find this both before and after Shakespeare. Chaucer's Duke Theseus speaks of how fate decrees a man to be

Nowe with his love, nowe in the colde grave,
Alone, withouten anie companye.

Spenser's Despair eulogises the end that "lays the soul to rest in quiet grave"; and the Poets' theory of ghosts in general regards the tomb as at least the trap-door through which they must emerge, if not as their fixed abode.

What does seem to be a comparatively new note is the attempt to represent such a state of things as compatible with positive pleasure on the part of those who are thus buried alive. The merely negative advantage of profound repose, that we might well conceive to be the utmost possible in such circumstances, does not satisfy many of our modern bards. They will not be content that a dead body should lie in its coffin, insensible, entranced; wide awake they will have it, and aware of its surroundings both above and below ground—the change of the seasons, the growth of vegetation, the song of birds, the visits of friends—and, moreover, capable of enjoying the whole thing. Abundant evidence of this may be found passim in the verse of our last hundred years or so. For, roughly speaking, the beginning of the nineteenth century was the date when this ghoulish mode first became prevalent, and it has remained with us ever since.

The cause, or causes, which it must have had may possibly be traced, in some measure at least, to the publication about that time of a famous poem by a great poet: Wordsworth's "We are Seven." It is true that the poem, which, by the way, contains a very imperfect rhyme to the much discussed word "porringer," does not strike any such note. Designed avowedly to illustrate the invincible ignorance of childhood on a certain point, its utterances are altogether dramatic. Opinions may differ as to their propriety and verisimilitude. To some people the little cottage girl may seem childish almost "beyond the reason of her youthful years," even though they were not more than eight. Others may hold that a natural instinct would have apprised her, through all her simplicity and vital vigour, or that she must have been singularly unimaginative and incurious to have so placidly acquiesced in the state of Jane and John; or else that the circumstance of her graveyard dwelling made her an exception and not a rule. Be that as it may, Wordsworth himself has explicitly and implicitly disclaimed all participation in this fancy:

No motion has she now, no force;
She neither hears nor sees;
Rolled round in earth's diurnal course
With rocks, and stones, and trees.

But readers are ever prone to ignore the distinction between an author's own sentiments and those of his characters. "As Shakespeare says," prefaces many a statement the ascription of which to himself might well have vexed his soul more than any meddling with his bones. And it would be quite in accordance with this propensity if Wordsworth's admirers and imitators should fasten upon the prominent features of the situation described in the poem, overlooking the fact that it is described as it appears to a little girl of eight. "Here," they may have reflected, "are two children dead and buried, yet supposed capable of listening while a third child sings. Why not follow the suggestion further, and imagine that many such faculties do persist after burial: that there are all manner of devices for fleeting the time in the grave whither we are going? The theme admits of innumerable variations, gay, pathetic, and withal easy enough to execute." And upon this hint they wrote, with results which presently began to appear in the "Keepsakes," "Garlands," and periodical literature of their day.

Then in the next generation came another well-known poem, which seems likely to have had the same effect—Mrs. Browning's "The Cry of the Children." This is also, of course, mainly dramatic; but equally, of course, the same class of readers would neglect to observe that it is her contemporaries who extol the happy lot of "Little Alice" in having died last year.

If you listen by that grave in sun and shower,
With your ear down, little Alice never cries;
Could we see her face, be sure we should not know her,
For the smile has time for growing in her eyes:
And merry go her moments, lulled and stilled in
The shroud by the kirk-chime.

Was Mrs. Browning conscious as she wrote of what a ghastly εἰσωνεία lurked in her words? It may be presumed so, as she proceeds to comment on them:

Alas, alas, the children! they are seeking Death in life, as best to have."

For a very deadly liveliness is in truth a marked characteristic of these speculations, even when they are to be taken as the outcome of sincere ignorance. Yet she has herself on more than one occasion indulged in them without that palliating excuse, and so have some of her peers.

It may be urged that to treat the matter seriously is a mistake: that our Ciceronian mottoes are inappropriate, because they originally referred to what was really a common superstition, whereas we now have to deal not so much with any sane person's actual belief as with a sort of sentimental conceit employed for literary purposes. There would be truth in such a statement, but it is not to the point. On the contrary, it seems rather to aggravate the offence, and demand the discountenancing thereof. For here on the frontier of two worlds the mists of doubt are surely dense enough without wantonly thickening them by conjuring up a fancy known to be a baseless figment. Even regarded merely as decorative, we cannot think it otherwise than unsuccessful. Though the death's head with a bone in its mouth, often presented for our contemplation by edifying writers, such as the seventeenth-century divines, is not—and is not meant to be—an attractive object, it appears still less so when it wears the wreath of roses twined about it by those who would invest with incongruous prettiness and pleasantness a nightmare life-in-grave, which might well "thick man's blood with cold."

That, however, is only a minor consideration in comparison with the fact that despite its palpable absurdity it does help to render more obscure any rational view of a future life, and thus makes us a better mark for what the author of "Hydriotaphia" calls "the heaviest stone that melancholy can throw at a man"; which is "to tell him that he is at the end of his nature, or that there is no further state to come . . ."

JANE BARLOW.

FICTION

The Woman's Victory. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. (Constable, 6s.)

MR. MAARTENS'S book is interesting and valuable because he writes with strength and distinction; because he takes cognisance of many things, and because everything he treats is shaped to a finish by a definite attitude towards life. His attitude is the chivalrous one: and his insight is as profound as chivalry will allow. At its best the chivalrous attitude is pleasant and refreshing and bears with it an aroma of reverence: at its worst it is mawkish and untrue and leads to a kind of specious enthusiasm so cheap and easy that it is worthless to feel and irritating to experience. There is something indiscriminating in its very essence, something plausible and unsatisfying. It would have given to Richard Feverel a happy ending, and thereby would have belittled Richard, belittled Lucy and belittled their love, robbing it of its exquisite simplicity by making it practicable. But Mr. Maartens generally catches chivalry at its best: and then the buoyancy which informs his style with vigour puts a rare swing into his telling of the stories. And there are some really fine short stories in the present collection. "A Resurrection," "The Dream Knight," "The Bargain," and the first story which names and notifies the book, go a long way to belie those who say that the art of the short story is a lost art in England. Nothing could be better than the swift picturing in "A Resurrection of Walter Gozlett" and the train of thought and circumstance that leads him back after twelve years of needless absence to Wiesbaden, where he lived his last years of boyhood and loved, with a boy's love, Julia his German friend's sister, who lived opposite. He calls on her and finds her disconcertingly unchanged. The interview, and his feelings at the interview, are poignantly vivid and real. Mr. Maartens is at his best in handling such a situation: a shadow of mockery, a hint of a sneer, and the thing would collapse into the ridiculous and lose all force and meaning. But the treatment is masterly in its delicate precision and has just that touch of hidden regret which lends the story, for all its slender fabric, a kind of fragile beauty. It is a pity that work so admirable as the stories mentioned and some others should be jostled by work so feeble and inferior as "The Diamonds" and several stories better unnamed. Il faut cultiver le jardin.

Hugh Leventhorpe. By EDWARD HARDINGHAM. (Simpkin, Marshall, 6s.)

MR. HARDINGHAM'S memory for quotations must be a great joy to himself. The quotations, too, are always apt, and sometimes of excellent quality, but, when they are scattered through a book of four hundred and sixty pages with a frequency that recalls the leaves in Vallombrosa, they have the unfortunate effect of so getting on the nerves of the reader that his eye roams over the page for them. It is like listening for the soft hiss which runs through a church when the congregation is saying the general confession, and comes to an "s" sound. Apart from this fault, "Hugh Leventhorpe" is an interesting story of adventure and buried treasure in Mexico, with a curious interlude in England, wherein some quite unnecessary discussions on Ritualism are diversified by High Church curates who shut up girls in disused mills and hire gipsies to kidnap persons who annoy them. However, the experienced novel-reader is happier than the reviewer: he not only knows where to skip, but is free to skip. There are no problems in the book—it is a brain-rest to come across a story which deals with actions instead of thoughts. There is plenty of excitement, and there are battles and murder and sudden death; and touches of pathos; and not too rosy a view of life for grown-up people to swallow, though they may have been playing at youth in the Mexican forests, with lovely girl-queens hidden among the Aztecs, and treachery and bravery in plenty. It is all charming, and it is delightful to pair all the couples off at the end, and leave them with a plentiful supply of babies and hard cash and supreme contentment. After talking of art and the terrible bathos of "the happy ending," it is with open arms that we welcome it. Kipling sang of the three-decker and the three-volume novel, when both were dying, and he said :

I left 'em all in couples, a-kissing on the decks ;
I left the lovers loving, and the parents signing cheques.
In endless English comfort, by county-folks caressed,
I left the old three-decker at the Islands of the Blest.

That is what we do after a most pleasant sojourn with "Hugh Leventhorpe." The only thing is, that we like Mr. Hardingham's story quite well enough to prefer it in his own words. We envy him his memory, and his knowledge of many languages; but we do not believe that men who want to commit suicide first recite German poetry to themselves, or that their friends who save them cap it with more poetry. Mr. Hardingham may call a dog a hound and a girl a maiden, and introduce little French phrases unnecessarily, if he likes; but he need not rely on other men's thoughts to catch our interest.

Amor Veritatis. By M. PENNELL. (Elliot Stock, 5s.)

THE author of "Amor Veritatis" makes an unfortunate attempt to combine instruction with amusement, and fails signally. The book is not instructive, being neither more nor less than a vehement and acrimonious diatribe against the Church of Rome, teaching us nothing that we have not learned already from other broader-minded and less prejudiced writers: neither can it be called amusing, owing to the pooriness of the plot and the weakness of the characters, if such a name can be given to the nine or ten wooden absurdities who compose the personnel of the book. Were it possible to consider them as anything other than mere machines, from whose mouths issue the denunciatory sentiments of the author, we should be disgusted at the depths of narrow-minded priggishness to which the hero and heroine have sunk. Their conversation, or rather, their long, dreary monologues, covering several pages at a time, are thickly interlarded with Scriptural quotations, and they have a detestable habit of breaking into inferior verse on the smallest provocation. A weak-minded and devout widow and an "obsequious priest" are the Roman Catholic elements in the book. The priest, a Jesuit needless to say, and capable of every kind of petty villainy, is foiled in the end, and we leave him, a sinister and scowling figure, no doubt plotting fresh mischief. The widow is rescued from the clutches of the "Romanists" by her intrepid daughter. The incidents in the book take place, apparently, at the present time, but the manners and language of the characters belong to the early forties. We are introduced to our heroine at an archery meeting and, though no mention is made of ringlets or crinolines, their sentiment pervades the atmosphere. The less said about the whole thing the better.

The Man Who Rose Again. By JOSEPH HOCKING. (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)

ONE of Oscar Wilde's delightful fairy tales ends thus :

"I am rather afraid I have annoyed him," answered the Linnet.
"The fact is, that I told him a story with a moral."
"Ah! That is always a very dangerous thing to do," said the Duck.

It is perhaps a little unfair to begin a review of a book by Mr. Joseph Hocking with a quotation from a story by Mr. Oscar Wilde; but the moral of the former is so very obvious that it called to mind the offended water-rat, who said that, had he known beforehand that there was a moral, he should certainly have said "Pooh!" Mr. Hocking does everything aboveboard, however; we know from the beginning that the cynical young man with a brilliant Parliamentary career, who is given to secret drinking will reform before we have done with him. When he put his marked handkerchief into the pocket of an unidentifiable corpse in the river one night, and, only waiting in London to read his obituary notices, disappeared, reappearing in the disguise of a Turk with an Italian name who plays golf like an expert, if seemed almost as if the five years of interval had seen his reformation. This would scarcely be dramatic, however; he is really only brought to his senses during a thunderstorm on Dartmoor. The story is not probable, but the first half of it is really interesting, although we know that there is that moral hanging over us. If Radford Leicester had gone to the dogs his own way, he would have been a fine character-study; but what would have become of the moral? He has to be converted from a brilliant, sarcastic, rather impossible young politician, well on the road to D.T., into, via Islamism, an orthodox Christian, and in the permanence of that conversion we have no faith at all. The girl who is the heroine of the book is the usual charming, rather priggish maiden who throws a man over just when he most wants her—loves him while he has no faults, and holds out a helping hand to him only so long as he is sturdy on his own feet. Mr. Hocking has started out to prove that: "Rob a man of his religion and he is only a savage, with a savage's instincts and desires." If one can agree with that point of view, the story will gain, though the incidents remain improbable. The treatment is interesting; but with such a moral as this, which only takes in one side of the question, the broader issues of character must suffer. As it is, it is a pleasant story, with a happy ending, an excellent doctrine, and four illustrations.

Of Mistress Eve. By HOWARD PEASE. (Constable, 6s.)

A MORE appropriate title for this story would have been: "Of the Lady Anne Clifford, Countess-Dowager of Dorset, Pembroke and Montgomery," but that would be long and clumsy. It is a narrative of Life on the Border during the period before and after the Restoration; but there is very little about the Stuarts, and too much about the Border. The lady who gives her name to the title takes a vow not to marry till the king enjoys his own again, which is a good, Stanley Weymanish start. But she is immediately left on one side, in favour of her ancient godmother, the Lady Anne, and the vow is only casually mentioned now and then. The king comes back, quite quietly, half-way through the book, and we are told that Eve became engaged and was married. Of course, this was entirely her own business, and the author evidently thought it was none of his or ours; but, after all, we had started out to read about Mistress Eve. She and her husband, a shadowy pair without a grain of character, went to London and met with shadowy adventures, while the narrator, her cousin, with a still more shadowy wife, wandered from Whitehall to the Docks and met kings and villains. When he heard that his cousin had been abducted, he said that something must be done, and went home to think. Four days later he moved in the matter, and in a casual walk met and tracked the one man in London who could help him. This coincidence would have been quite in keeping, but for the four days' interval. People who think for that period about what they are going to do in serious and pressing circumstances, do not go out and grasp the skirts of Happy Chance like that. Happy Chance loves not the deliberate. The fact is that Mr. Pease has had access to some interesting documents about the Lady Anne, and he is much interested in the Border. What he wanted to do was to write a biography of the lady, with a photogravure from an old picture, and copious notes. In an evil moment he decided to make a story out of his material and to turn it into a sequel to his "Magnus Sinclair." The result is a spoilt biography and a spoilt novel; there is no plot, and, when Mr. Pease is tired of going on, he leaves off. That is on page 301. If the period and personages were more important, it would be a palatable way of serving up a history lesson; but the learners would have to be cautioned against too implicit a reliance on the grammar. However, there is a really nice murder, under the guise of a duel; and the narrator saw it only by climbing up the waterspout of a lonely inn on a Cumberland moor and looking through the floor, which seems to have been of the open-work kind. After seeing this, it was quite a long time before he could get to sleep; but we thought we knew what he would do, and five lines later he did it. He fell into an uneasy dose towards morning.

FINE ART

Warwickshire. Painted by FRED WHITEHEAD, R.B.A.; described by CLIVE HOLLAND. Sussex. Painted by WILFRID BALL, R.E. (Black, 20s. net each.)

OF recent years the production of table-literature, that is to say of books the primary object of which is to solace the lonely vigil of premature callers, has received a fresh impetus from the invention of the three-colour process. In place of the "Book of Beauty" or "Portfolio of Royalty," without which no lady's drawing-room or fashionable physician's waiting-room was complete in the forties, we now have overgrown octavos illustrated with sixty to a hundred full-page reproductions in colours, gaudily bound and issued with much flourishing of trumpets by one of Mr. Charles Heath's numerous successors. To regard these volumes as serious contributions to art or literature would be to arrogate to them pretensions which few could hope to justify. Their illustrations demand, as a rule, no weightier consideration than the picture postcards which they resemble, and which in some cases we know to be duplicate reproductions. Their letterpress, to which the publishers admittedly attach secondary importance, calls for no more exacting criticism than that applicable to guide-books and humbler topographical works.

The volumes on Warwickshire and Sussex which Messrs. Black have added to their "Beautiful Books" are typical examples of this class of literature. We have seen better results obtained from colour-printing, a process which is still in its infancy, but we have also seen worse. Mr. Wilfrid Ball's paintings of Sussex are strictly objective, and give no clearer revelation of the painter's personality than a faint suggestion of neatness, methodical habits and orderly behaviour. Of the county depicted they tell us with the help of colour a little more than could the average photographer, yet not so much as could a photographer with a gift for seizing the most salient and characteristic features of a landscape. In his choice of subject Mr. Ball has allowed himself to be obsessed by the picturesque cottage, and cottages and streets are not the monopoly of any single English county. Had he given us fewer of these and a greater number of more extensive views, as his Malling Mill, Cliffs near Eastbourne, and Crowborough Heath, Mr. Ball's illustrations would be more representative of the county whose distinctive features, its woods, its downs and sea-bathed pastures, are not sufficiently emphasised.

Mr. Whitehead's pictures of Warwickshire are more personal, and if all showed the same decorative charm and technical dexterity as his Guy's Cliff Mill, his illustrations would take a high place in this series. Unfortunately, Mr. Whitehead frequently falls away from his own standard, and several of his illustrations have the appearance of being copies of photographs rather than direct impressions of nature. He is at his best in his broader sketches, where his vigorous colour touches atone for the weakness of his draughtsmanship, and atmosphere is not lost by the over-elaboration of unimportant details. His subjects are generally well chosen, though the leafiness of Warwickshire might have been insisted upon by his painting fewer swans and more trees.

In the generous supply of text to this volume, Mr. Clive Holland says a great deal about Warwickshire, though very little that has not been said sufficiently before. The triteness of his style and his tender consideration for the ignorance of his reader are typically illustrated by his allusions to "William Shakespeare, one of the greatest poets of any age," and to the Earl of March, "afterwards made Edward IV."

The letterpress of Sussex is shorter and less tedious. Of the three sections into which it is divided, the second, dealing with "The Historical Development of Sussex," is decidedly the best and contains much matter with regard to Roman remains and family histories which will be of genuine interest to the amateur antiquary. Few people save reviewers, we imagine, take up a book of this class with the deliberate intention of reading it from cover to cover, but whosoever dips into this section of "Sussex" is likely to find himself speedily immersed.

MUSIC

A HISTORY OF BEETHOVEN'S SYMPHONIES

FIVE hundred pages or thereabouts on the symphonies of Beethoven, published in this present year, do not inspire the reader with the expectation of much new reading, and on opening M. Prod'homme's book, "Les Symphonies de Beethoven," the first impression is that somehow it has been belated, that it ought to have appeared at latest twenty years ago. But the author very modestly apologises for this in a preface, on the grounds of "la penurie d'ouvrages écrits en notre langue sur le grand compositeur allemand," and he therefore attempts to do for his countrymen something of what Grove did for English-speaking music-lovers in "Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies." He has analysed each symphony and made careful investigation into the circumstances which influenced the production of each and its reception, and has compiled this ample volume from very full knowledge of his material. That this should be reached at second-hand was inevitable, but the author is not slow to acknowledge his indebtedness to many authorities, especially to Nottebohm, Wasielewski, and Grove.

M. Prod'homme's personal share of the work is chiefly shown in the arrangement. The plan is clear and simple and logically carried out. Each symphony has a chapter to itself, which is divided into three sections. The first deals with the antecedents of the work. It is partly biographical. How far the circumstances of his life affected Beethoven's work must ever remain in some doubt. In certain places the two are easily connected, at others there seems something like a contradiction, as between the deep emotion of his letters and the light-heartedness of the fourth symphony. But this almost tabular arrangement saves the author from that sort of discussion which is now futile and even impertinent. The facts are given with copious quotations from the correspondence and other authorities, as well as references to, and quotations from Beethoven's sketch-book. In the second section the symphony itself is analysed, with of course musical quotations of themes and important passages. It is here that one feels some disappointment. The nine symphonies have been so often subjected to the process, from the crude statement of themes found in a concert programme to the really individual and glowing descriptions in which Sir George Grove excelled, that one expects something more than the rather conventional eulogy and description of M. Prod'homme. In a work of this size an elementary knowledge of the symphonies might have been assumed, and a more detailed comparison of passages made and deductions drawn as to the composer's own development. To take a single instance, the Introduction of the first symphony foreshadows in its tendency to break away from the tonic key the more extended excursions of this kind which introduce the fourth and seventh.

That chord of C with the flattened seventh in it, which begins the first symphony, was in itself almost sufficient to proclaim Beethoven's new epoch, but M. Prod'homme only says—and this lack of critical insight, or at any rate of the power or wish to convey such insight to the reader, is apparent through all the analyses. Where occasionally he indulges in a comparison with other works, as where he remarks on a similarity between the first subject of the Eroica and that of Brahms's second symphony, the allusion is not very forcible. After all, there is little in common between these two, save the triple time and the fact that each is built on an arpeggio of the tonic chord.

L'attention fortement éveillée par ces sautes brusques, de quatre en quatre, après cette sorte de lutte entre trois tonalités différentes, le ton de la symphonie s'impose et l'introduction, de douze mesures en tout, amène bientôt le premier thème. . . .

The third part of each chapter deals with the production of each symphony. First performances in various countries are recorded, and press notices and criticisms quoted at length. These are very much more interesting than the sections about the symphonies themselves, for in them is given a fairly complete picture of the advance of musical taste in general in the few years, only twenty-four, which saw the production of the nine symphonies. The quotations are full and drawn from all European countries, not even excluding England. There is a little too much of it, though it is good to include samples of the rather patronising comments on the first two symphonies, that we may appreciate the storm which gathered round the Eroica, and Beethoven's ultimate justification in his complete acceptance by the best minds on the production of the Choral Symphony. It shows, in fact, quite a genius for selection, and it is this quality in the author, as displayed in the first and third parts of each chapter, which makes the book a striking collection of thought on Beethoven. It includes the thought of his contemporaries and of musicians who came after him, and it is excellently summed up and presented by one whose knowledge is thorough and discriminating.

The book is recommended in a short preface by M. Edouard Colonne, the eminent conductor, who pays therein a tribute to Beethoven's genius, which to some extent atones for the lack of personal contribution of this kind in the work itself. We Englishmen, if we are enthusiastic, are apt to take our enthusiasm for granted and leave it unexpressed, so it is good for us to read such words as these:

Gloire à lui sur la terre! Les peuples prêtent l'oreille; les historiens proclament sa puissance; les interprètes répandent sa doctrine; le monde obéit à sa voix; se hausser jusqu'à lui c'est devenir plus grand.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE Cambridge University Press have ready and will issue next month a Bible so printed that both the Authorised and Revised Versions may be read from the same text, without difficulty and without need of reference from text to margin or from one text to a second. The method adopted is to print in large type such words as are common to both Versions. Where there is a difference between the Versions, however minute, the one line of large type divides into two parallel lines of smaller type, of which the upper gives the reading of the Revised and the lower that of the Authorised Version. Thus, by reading along the large type and following, where it ceases, the upper of the two small lines, the Revised Version may be read; while the large type, in conjunction with the lower of the small lines, gives the continuous text of the Authorised Version. Many methods have been tried to facilitate comparisons between the two texts, but it is claimed that no method other than that now adopted has given a comparative view of the two Versions showing at a glance the position, extent and exact nature of every difference between them. On account of the way in which the type is set, the Bible is to be known as "The Interlinear Bible."

The third and concluding volume of "Christian Missions and Social Progress," by the Rev. James Dennis is about to be published by Messrs. Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier.

Dr. James Donaldson, who has been Principal of St. Andrews University since 1889, has for some time been engaged on a work the character and scope of which are sufficiently indicated by its title—"The Position of Women in Ancient Rome and among the Early Christians." It is over forty years since Dr. Donaldson completed his "Critical History of Christian Literature from the Death of the Apostles till the Nicene Creed," and almost a quarter of a century since his "Lyra Græca" appeared. His new work is to be published by Messrs. Longmans.

Mr. W. J. Bryan, before he proceeds on his projected Australasian tour, will finish his work on "The World's Famous Orations." The volumes—there will be ten in all—are to be published by Messrs. Funk and Wagnalls at a price that will bring the work, according to Mr. Bryan's wish, within the reach of the working classes "as a stimulus to democracy in all English-speaking lands." Three volumes will be devoted to Great Britain and three to America, and one volume respectively to Ireland, Continental Europe, Greece and Rome, thus covering, according to the publishers, "the entire range of historic oratory from the time of Achilles to the day of Roosevelt and Campbell-Bannerman!"

Messrs. Skeffington's new Autumn novels will include "Bubble Reputation" by Alfred Buchanan; "Kinsman" by David Heron; "The Betrayal of Mistress Donis" by George Cannock Dyke, and "The Web of Circumstance" by Dr. Lucian De Zilwa, all of which will be published early in September.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE PRONUNCIATION OF "DETAIL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The question put by "Inquirer" last week hastens my letter to you on the general subject of Pronunciation, which I should have been glad to postpone till the winter.

Unfortunately the dictionaries give little help in such matters, even when not positively misleading, as like the "Standard" in the present instance, instead of seeking and conforming to the best rule or idiom, they merely balance the usages of certain arbitrarily selected "authorities" and advise the public to follow the majority. This futile and inane custom is adopted also by amateur mentors in literary and ordinary papers, as, for instance, where "S. L. H." gave a list of authors writing "averse to" and "averse from" respectively, and decided that the former were the more numerous, whereas of course the latter phrase is the only correct one no matter how few use it.

In the case of words like "detail," where noun and verb are spelt alike, the rule is that the accent shall be on the first syllable in the former and on the second in the latter. This at once disposes of all such as the general public seem undecided about, e.g., content, contract, control, combine, perfect, combat, address, accord, recess, concern, incline, detail, etc. Here sticklers will triumphantly imagine they have caught me in a trap, pointing to words like effect, delay, which are only accented one way. But now comes in the one great master rule which settles all such problems. This is the simple and obvious one that the idiom is to be followed as far as possible; in other words, that in cases of doubt preference is to be given to the analogical form. Hence the first syllable is correctly stressed in the substantives defect, report, repute, refrain, resume, precise, expose, disguise, discourse, return, while even ally (which should be properly alliee), seeing it has assumed the present form, should also be pronounced to correspond.

Pedants delight in evolving some new fashion in pronunciation because, they say, it is "more euphonious," and distinguishes the superfine from the common herd. Thus, as if we had not already trouble enough with our "h," they are constantly insisting that it should be silent in certain arbitrarily chosen words, such as hotel, herb, humble, historical, heroic (I don't know whether they include heterogeneous). Hence confusion is worse confounded and further perplexities are added to the trials of writers and school-children. Yet here again the great main rule smooths all difficulties. Wherever possible the aspirate should be sounded, that is, in every word in the language but hour, heir, honour, honest, and their derivatives, nor would there be any harm if it were restored to these also, as they are mere accidental survivals from times when, as in the biblical horse and house, its pronunciation was a matter of individual taste and fancy.

Euphony, indeed, is the worst possible criterion. It is appealed to in justification of the nauseous dragging in of French words or phrases, mostly by half-educated authors or journalists who have but a smattering of that language. Those who really are well versed in it use it the least. Thus in the admirable translations of Zola's works by Ernest Vizetelly, it is but rarely that one finds a French word, although a slovenly writer would have yielded to the temptation to save trouble by simple transcription. People who so adore French should write in it altogether, if they can, and abjure their own tongue entirely. In cases where a new word for the French is really required it should be anglicised completely. Thus fracas (rumpus, shindy, brawl, tussle) should rime with jackass (as in Burns). There are in French no such words as locale, morale, envelope, portmanteaux, double entendre, etc., at least with the meanings intended, and those who thus use them only advertise their own ignorance. There is no need to employ unpronounceable French words for recount, recount, shamoy, employee, debauchee, attachee, avalanch, nor meaningless or ungrammatical alleged translations like "on the carpet," "it goes without saying," "castles in Spain," for "on the (table-)cloth," "it needs no saying," "castles in the air." If half the pains were taken to evolve or discover good English expressions that are expended in looking up or inventing pseudo-French affectations, when indeed these are not mere indolent or brainless acceptations of current jargon, many good old words might come into use again. Thus "scoll" expresses exactly the sense usually given by débris, "urchin" that of gamin, "mettle" or "fettle" of moral(e), and so on. And is "ballade" to be pronounced "ballaid" or "ballahd"?

I cannot too strongly insist that Consistency is usually an infallible guide. As is pointed out on p. 127, appeals to even Latin usage soon lead to an impasse, and as regards quantity the only safe rule to follow is: When in doubt, sound the vowel short. This for three reasons: first, because it sounds better (I make this concession to euphony); secondly, because the short vowels have more nearly retained their original phones; and thirdly, because consistent with analogy and the genius of the language. Thus not only doctrinal, but inspiration, finance, tremor, respite, dynamic, etc., ad libitum. So with the wholeseries of words like docile, hostile, mercantile.

Many words have odd pronunciations without any reason at all. Thus indict, phthisis, schism, suffice, executive, conquer, regiment, clerk, etc., might all be spoken as spelt, bréal is a dis-syllable (there is no Latin ordealis) and promenade should agree with parade or esplanade, tomato with potato.

EVACUSTES A. PHIPSON.

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—This is essentially a question for the generation now commencing at elementary schools and all succeeding generations, and it concerns those who have already left school mostly as to their responsibility for the education of the former. In other words, it is hopeless and useless to expect educated people to alter their spelling until they are forced to do it by the invading custom of the youngsters when they mingle amongst them endowed with a close approximation to phonetic and logical spelling. Educated people however are the only ones who can instruct the young, and those who study the science and practise the art of teaching must at least be converted to recognising the benefits of phonetic spelling before it can be set to work in schools.

To bring about this conversion is the task which reformers really have before them. It must consist mainly in breaking down or weakening antiquated prejudice so far as to establish toleration for elasticity in spelling and a general disregard for all the existing canons of Orthography as an indispensable mark of education and good breeding.

Ingenious and elaborate stages of reform such as so ably arranged by Mr. E. A. Fyppson in the ACADEMY of August 4 are of very little practical utility. It is difficult to remember precise rules for limited reform, and no one can be hurt by adopting an elastic principle in preference to a rigid code.

It is desirable that the untainted minds of the children should at once be emancipated from the senseless drudgery of memorising a multitude of grotesque arrangements of letters taken to designate sound but which are neither correct in accordance with any assignable rational and consistent values of the letters nor reliably indicative of the origin or history of the words. During the transition stage while these adolescents shall gradually displace the senescent users of the traditional spelling, it is inevitable that there should be a wild outbreak of disorderly spelling. It is of little advantage to try and crystallise and stiffen this progress into a number of precisely graded stages. Elasticity and tolerance is what is most wanted. It is hopeless to demand uniformity. Nor should reformers be disheartened and their opponents be derisive because of the presentation of a host of schemes exhibiting larger or smaller degrees of divergence. In this branch of biological evolution, as in others, variation must supply the forms to be sifted by national selection.

AUTHORS AND LITERARY AGENTS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As it happens that I wrote the article on Agents in the August Fortnightly, concerning which you have made good-natured comments this week, perhaps you will let me answer the problem you have set in the following paragraph:

"A, a novelist, has written a successful novel; B, his publisher, asks him for another, of course through C, his agent. But C happens to know that since A published that novel another firm of publishers has become desperately anxious for novels of that kind, and is willing to pay A half as much again as B is prepared to offer. What is C's duty? To 'maintain the close literary relationship' between A and B, or to get for A the biggest profit he can? Whichever he does, he will be in the black books of either author or publishers."

It is a problem the agent is so often called upon to solve that the answer can be given off-hand. In the given circumstances the ordinary mundane agent, who would be the last to claim that he is ideal or that he wants to do anything except make his business profitable and at the same time give every one a fair deal, would carefully figure out whether the offer from the new publisher, whom we will call D, would bring as much ultimately in money and prestige to client A as B's offer. If he decides that, everything considered, D's offer is better than B's, he gives B a chance to equal D's offer. If B won't do it D gets the book, and B can have no reasonable ground of complaint, while A (we will hope) realises anew the advantage of having the right sort of an agent for work that is in demand. The less the value of the author's work, the less the value of an agent to him. That sounds like a paradox, but it is absolutely true, and my article in the August Fortnightly was intended to prove it.

A NEW NOVEL by

John Oliver
Hobbes (Mrs. Craigie)

entitled

THE DREAM

and

THE BUSINESS

Price 6s.

This is unquestionably the most brilliant novel John Oliver Hobbes has written. It is crowded with figures, each of which is a distinctive personality conceived with that vividness and definiteness of outline which we expect in the work of John Oliver Hobbes; there are pictures of Society life and the life of the stage, scenes abroad and at home, two very fascinating love stories, and sympathetic studies both of Nonconformity and Roman Catholicism; while interwoven with the tale is a problem of modern life which will interest every reader and cause every reader to think. The story is written with John Oliver Hobbes's wonted epigrammatic incisiveness and scholarliness of phrase, is full of movement and animation, and will probably come to be regarded as one of the most notable contributions to English fiction for the last decade.

Note.—A Sixpenny Edition of John Oliver Hobbes's first story, "Some Emotions and a Moral," will be issued immediately.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WE have found not a little entertainment in two volumes of essays, or, rather, occasional papers, by Mr. Samuel McChord Crothers, an American man of letters. Mr. Crothers is not a formal essayist: he is a causeur, a chatter, a cultivated person who takes you aside and talks as he will, starting from a given topic, but leaving it when he wishes to, talking round and about it, always freshly, usually with some pleasing paradox, sometimes brilliantly. The title of one of his volumes, "The Gentle Reader," appealed to us at once, and the first paper fulfilled our hopes. The Gentle Reader, Mr. Crothers implies, has not yet died out, and he gives some account of his characteristics; but what he is really anxious to talk about is the author who wrote for the gentle reader, and so encouraged him to survive. This is the fine old leisurely class of authors, of whom none are left; the kind that took the gentle reader aside, and interrupted the business in hand to have a good talk over it, much as a modern plumber will interrupt his work to talk about it with his mate.

Fielding wrote like that, with his long and delightful digressions in the middle of a story; Isaak Walton was another of the order; in Sterne we find the manner carried to an extreme. Montaigne, Burton, and many another had no business; they were all for these interruptions. And there are the authors with whom it is a delight to dwell, the authors who become personal friends of the gentle reader. They talk to him about himself and about themselves; and he buys them to keep, not to devour.

The point of view has changed since the days of those writers. Nowadays we aim not at reading, but at having read (the distinction is Mr. Crothers's, and a good one). And much of it is waste labour. When a man complains that the great number of new books prevents him reading the old books, he is making a feeble excuse. It is easier, says Mr. Crothers somewhere (in a paper, we fancy, on "The Honorable Points of Ignorance"), to talk about a new book before you have read it, than after. And one reason for that, which appears to have escaped him, is this: that, thanks to the modern Press, it is very easy to get a good idea (good, that is, for purposes of conversation) of a new book in ten minutes.

The wise man will choose carefully two papers which deal with books, opposed, if possible, in point of view and in manner of treatment; and he will read both. He will thus, in one evening, have observed from both sides all the new books, and will be well-primed against his next dinner-party. The rest of the week remains for the reading and reading again of the old books. So that we light on something of a paradox. The more literary journalism there is, the more time has the really gentle reader for his old friends. He may, however, now and then make a new friend; and we find qualities in Mr. Crothers's "Gentle Reader" and "Pardoner's Wallet" which will endear him to many.

From America we receive more books of such essays or papers than come from all the English publishers. The reason possibly is that, since there are more readers and writers in America than in England, therefore there are more examples of each different kind of book. But the essay, or the occasional paper, is becoming rarer and rarer in England. The essayist labours, of course, under a great disadvantage. Steele, Hazlitt, Stevenson, one or another is sure to be thrown in his teeth by the reviewers, just as it used to be the foolish fashion to tell a minor poet that he was not a Milton. But the novelist labours under the same burden: Fielding, Scott and Thackeray have lived and written; and the thought does not deter the novelist. The dearth of essays is probably due to the prevalence of fiction. The stimulus or the sedative, doctors tell us, must be increased, if it is to preserve its efficacy. The palate enured to chilis finds no flavour in white pepper. And the taste formed on novels, the hottest and strongest kindest of mental food, finds the essay insipid. So far as the interpretation of life goes, we are ready to believe that a novel—a good novel—gives more of it than an equally good essay; but we may be permitted a sigh for the disappearance of a peculiarly pleasant form of literary art.

In the third series (vol. ii.) of "Archaeologia Aeliana" the miscellaneous tracts relating to antiquity published by the Society of Antiquaries of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, we find a very interesting paper by Dr. T. M. Allison on "The Flail and its Varieties." It seems strange, somehow, to find the flail referred to as an "antiquity," and yet the people under sixty who have actually seen it in use must be few. The present writer saw it but once; wielded by a man on the little threshing-floor at the bottom of an old west-country garden. That was nearly thirty years ago, and the thresher then spoke of himself as one of the few men left who knew how to wield the dangerous instrument. Dangerous it must have been, no less so than a stock-whip, in the hands of an inexperienced workman.

"The flail," writes Dr. Allison, "is mentioned by Milton, Shakespeare, Burns and Oliver Wendell Holmes [a queer conjunction of names], but is not named in Scripture." The last part of the statement sounds odd, until we remember that corn in the East is trodden out, not threshed. The threshing-floor, which is often made the symbol of judgment and retribution in the Old Testament, was the place where the beasts trod out the grain. One cannot but imagine, however, what splendid use the Old Testament writers would have made of the flail, had they known it. The measured fall of its unceasing blows has much that is terrible about it.

Some of the words Dr. Allison preserves are interesting. A flail is in Gaelic a "suist," in Scotch a "flinging-tree"—readers of Burns will remember his lines:

The thresher's weary flingin'-tree
The lee-lang day had tired me;
And when the sun had clos'd his e'e,
Far i' the West,
Ben i' the spence, right pensively
I gaed to rest;

—a "threshall" in Hampshire, a "drashall" in Devon, "the sticks" in Weadale, and "frail" in South Durham and Yorkshire. The handle was called in England and Ireland the "handstaff," the "haft" in Scotland, "lorg" in Gaelic, and "collop" or "collopon" in original Irish; and the second stick, or "souple"—that which is attached to the handle, usually by a thong of leather, and falls on the corn—was called the “beater” in Hampshire, the “soople” or “swingle” in Northumberland, the “swingle” in Kent, the “swipple” in Yorkshire, “buaalten” in Gaelic, and “buailtan” or “boottan” in old Irish. In Devon the souple was called the “flail” (the whole thing being the “drashall”) and the “threshing-tree” in Perthshire. The Old English name for it was the “swingle-tree.” These are only a few of the terms given by Dr. Allison, whose article is full of lore on the subject and amply illustrated. It is strange to reflect that the Japanese have always used flails for threshing rice, though their bamboo flail is a clumsy weapon.

The Times of last Thursday had an interesting article on the Library of the University of London, which is shortly to be thrown open, under certain restrictions, to the public. Many of the books in it belonged to George Grote, the historian of Greece, and to Professor Augustus de Morgan. Grote bequeathed his books—mainly classical and historical—to the University, and his habit (shared by Professor de Morgan) of writing bibliographical and biographical notes in them adds considerably to their interest and value. Other benefactors of the library have been the Goldsmiths' Company, which presented among many other things Professor Somerton Foxwell's library, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Lord Granville, Lord Avebury, and others. The librarian is Mr. Lawrence W. Haward, and the assistant librarian is Mr. Reginald A. Rye. The Library is to be opened by Lord Rosebery on October 29.

Some of the books are of rare value and importance. Bibliophiles will be interested in the “Kalendarium” of Joannes de Monteregio, printed by Ratdolt in 1476, which is the first known book with a title-page bearing the printer's names and date, information usually kept in those days for the colophon. Then there are fine copies of the first four editions of Euclid, the first edition being Venice, 1482; a Bale: “Illustrium Maioris Britanniae Scriptorum” (Ipswich, 1548), which is “the foundation of English Biography,” and a “Whetstone of Witte,” which is the seconde parte of Arithmetike, by Robert Record, 1557, which is the book referred to by Sir Walter Scott in “The Fortunes of Nigel” as the only book in the usurer's house besides the Bible.

In a little book of jottings called “Notes of a Nomad,” by W. A. Horn (published by Messrs. Melville and Mullen), we find an extraordinary example of ingenuity. He was challenged, it appears, to write thirty lines on sea-sickness, with a musical term in every line; and here is his first stanza:

If rolling is her crotchet
This vessel ought to score;
She spoils my rest, she spoils my notes,
She spoils my répertoire.

But he improves as he goes on:

There demi goes my dinner,
As the ship on upper C
Appoggiaturas. Oh! the brute,
She's pitched too high for me. . . .

I know you'll think me very bass.
I'll pause till calm prevails;
It's all because they've gone and set
A bad falsetto sails.

I cannot scale the dizzy mast:
The chords are very slack;
Oh! how I shake; I know I shall
B flat upon my back.

I'll bet a tenor that she strikes
The bar upon the lee;
Andante up the money, should
She safely reach the key.

Poker players will see the meaning of the reference contained in the word “Andante.”

The joy of misquotation is so widely diffused that it seems a pity to reserve the following instance of that error for private consumption. Every one knows Longfellow's “Resignation”:

There is no flock, however watched and tended,
But one dead lamb is there.

This was given in a recent examination paper, obviously without intent to parody, as:

There is no flock, however watched and tended,
But one black sheep is there.

An example of the misuse of a single word was furnished by another candidate, who credited Mr. Chamberlain with a habit of collecting orchards. The figure known to grammarians as litotes, and defined as the suggestion of a strong notion by the use of a weak form of speech, was pleasantly exemplified as follows: “Sometimes, as in the case of rabbits, the hobby is neglected, and unpleasant circumstances may arise.” A seer was defined as one who overlooks work done by others. Wordsworth's “poring antiquarian” became a perspiring curio-hunter, and the immortal twins were partially disguised as “Romulus and Romford.”

With reference to our suggestion made two weeks ago that, as among servants there is one voice for the mistress and another for the kitchen, so among poor people there is one language for the “quality” and another for their own circle, a correspondent writes pointing out that in one district of England at least, the Peak of Derbyshire, the natives are bilingual.

“Amongst themselves they speak the old Derbyshire dialect, which resembles the English of the First Prayer-book of Edward VI.: but they keep modern English for strangers who live amongst them, the clergyman, the schoolmaster, and the policeman, whom they habitually speak of as ‘foreigners.’ So-and-So's daughter is his ‘wench,’ children they call ‘childer,’ ornaments are ‘gauds,’ and my wife was much surprised one day at being asked if she had ever ‘a cast-away body,’ meaning a bodice, ‘to give to a poor wench.’” Probably this bilingual state is common all over the country.

Professor Richard Lodge, occupant of the History chair in Edinburgh University, in opening the holiday courses in modern languages in the northern capital the other day, paid a fine tribute to the influence of Sir Walter Scott. The Scots, according to Professor Lodge, who were born on this side the Border, had proved themselves the most adaptable nation in the history of Europe, the most eager and most ready to learn from its neighbours and allies. It was only at the beginning of the nineteenth century that the Scots intercourse with the continent of Europe ceased to be a conspicuous element in the development of Scotland; and this change Dr. Lodge attributed above everything else to the genius of Sir Walter Scott, which operated more strongly, he was certain, than the Act of Union or the growth of commerce to bridge over the gulf which had so long divided England from Scotland. In commemoration of Scott's birthday, the Edinburgh and Glasgow statues of Scott, it may be stated, were florally decorated on August 15, his birthday, and there is a proposal that the anniversary of the great romancist's death next month should be appropriately celebrated at Dryburgh Abbey.

It was mentioned in the ACADEMY the other week that the librarian of Camberwell Central Library was engaged in a biographical work relating to noted Camberwellians. It was not stated, however—and the fact is not very widely known—that Lord Byron spent a part of his early schooldays at an academy in the Dulwich district of Camberwell. It is an interesting and little known fact, too, that Mendelssohn composed his "Spring Song" in a house on Denmark Hill adjoining the new Ruskin Park. The editor of the South London Mail is engaged, we understand, on a South London bibliography.

Among recent acquisitions to the British Museum Library is a small volume, "Poems," J. Ballantyne, Edinburgh, 1803, in which appear for the first time and anonymously Thomas Campbell's "Lochiel's Warning" and "Hohenlinden." The original manuscript of the former has long been in the possession of Lord Minto at Minto House, Hawick, where the poem was written. Both poems were written in 1802, and the latter—called by its author "a mere drum and trumpet thing"—was rejected by the Greenock Advertiser.

Professor Saintsbury, whose "appreciation" of Walter Pater forms the chief feature of the August Bookman, writes that: "If you cannot construe Pater aright from the 'Studies,' the 'Marius,' and the 'Appreciations,' he himself would do you very little good if he could arise and speak afresh with whatever considerations and correctives. . . . In literature . . . I know no one who supplies at once so much stimulus, and so much practical help, with such a range of illustrative enjoyment into the bargain. And apart from literature—in almost the widest ranges of thought and life—I can see no reason why his method should not be applied with an infinite gain of satisfaction to the soul as well as to the senses: and with no necessary—with no even probable—prospect of disaster, except in cases where disaster was antecedently all but certain."

We are sometimes told that romance is dead, and that the adventures of the heroes of "Kingston of the wind and wave" or of "Ballantyne the brave," can never again be witnessed in real life. But the papers of the last week have given us facts that make Defoe, or Stevenson, even Jules Verne, seem timid inventors. It seems that Robinson Crusoe's island has disappeared in the Valparaiso upheaval, though whether Defoe intended the island to be on the East or the West of South America is a point never likely to be settled beyond dispute. If the earthquake has carried off the island, then it has plagiarised Jules Verne. At the same time, we have the starting of the good ship Xena for a mysterious treasure island somewhere off the African coast in the approved manner of Stevenson himself. A Captain Jones left a chart telling of a spot in the ocean where diamonds apparently may be had for the mere scratching of the earth, and a secret expedition has been fitted out to secure the treasure. The Xena, under sealed orders, is now on the way, and even in these days of much traffic and fast ships, expects to be able to elude the vigilance of all "shadowers."

We understand that the Russian Government has purchased the library of Alexander Pushkin. It is to be housed temporarily in the Academy of Sciences in St. Petersburg, and there is a proposal on foot to found a museum, bearing the name of the poet, to which the library will be transferred.

Mr. D. S. MacColl is heartily to be congratulated on the first acquisition made by the Tate Gallery under his keepership. Ford Madox Brown's Chaucer at the Court of Edward III. is of great intrinsic value as an example of the decorative treatment of an historical subject, and it is not less welcome as a reminder of the long roll of famous British painters unrepresented, or inadequately represented, in what is nominally the National Gallery of British Art. Hitherto the Tate Gallery has contained but one example of Brown's noble art, Christ Washing Peter's Feet, and though the first master of Rossetti may now be said to be satisfactorily represented, no work by his second, Mr. Holman Hunt, finds a place in the collection. We hear that a movement is on foot to secure his last painting, The Lady of Shalott for the Tate Gallery, and if its purchase can be effected we know no work by Mr. Hunt better calculated to impress posterity with his great gifts as a designer and illustrator.

Within the last few days there have also been hung in the Tate Gallery five new Turners—Tivoli, The Arch of Constantine, The Burning of The Ships, The Old Chain Pier, Brighton, and A Ship Aground—raised from the tomb of those apartments in the National Gallery to which the public has not access. The new director, Sir Charles Holroyd, has done well in so speedily bringing these long-hidden works before the public, but the steady dispersal of a collection bequeathed to the nation on the express condition that it should be kept together in one building emphasises the need for a separate gallery in which the huge Turner bequest of oils, water-colours and drawings might more worthily be housed and more effectively displayed. We trust that when the Government consider the question of the extension of the National Galleries at Trafalgar Square and Millbank—the necessity of which was urged by the Earl of Carlisle in the House of Lords a few weeks ago—they will recognise that the formation of a separate Turner Gallery will be the best solution of this problem as well as the discharge of a debt long overdue.

Nothing is more difficult to gauge than the taste of a future generation in art, and a picture which cost an acute critic thousands of pounds one year may be worth only hundreds a decade later. The late Mr. Woods was undoubtedly one of the most far-seeing buyers of his age, but that there is no royal road to success as a picture-dealer or picture-collector is proved by the auction room records. In the current issue of a contemporary monthly Mr. W. Roberts has an article on "The Ups and Downs of Picture Prices," in which he tabulates a number of recent records, several of which have already been given in the ACADEMY. Mr. Woods bought carefully, and his purchases were comparatively few, but hardly any of them realised less than he gave. A pair of vases of flowers by Baptiste, for which he gave seven shillings, brought fifty-four guineas at his sale in May; his greatest triumphs, however, were Hoppner's Lady Waldegrave and Lawrence's Miss Emily C. Ogilvie. Bought for twenty-three pounds and two hundred guineas respectively, they realised six thousand and three thousand guineas. No one, we think, has beaten, or is likely to beat, Mr. Wynn Ellis's record for the Gainsborough Duchess of Devonshire: it cost him sixty-five pounds and was purchased by Messrs. Agnew for over ten thousand pounds. At the sale of Raeburn's remaining works in 1877, forty-nine portraits were sold for six thousand pounds. Within the last two seasons thirteen of his pictures have brought no less than forty-two thousand nine hundred pounds.

Gainsborough's Portrait of Viscountess Tracy was purchased in 1895 for one thousand five hundred pounds; in 1906 it sold for six thousand guineas. Morland's Morning, Higgles Preparing for Market, brought only fifty-five guineas in 1861; last year it realised two thousand guineas. Twenty guineas was paid for Rembrandt's The Evangelist in 1854, and two thousand guineas in 1905. Sir Joshua Reynolds's Simplicity: Miss Gwatkin cost one hundred and sixty guineas in 1884, and two thousand one hundred guineas in 1905: ten years hence we think the price will have dropped. Romney's The Stanhope Children realised only twenty-eight guineas in 1872, and was sold for four thousand six hundred guineas in June; and Turner's Rape of Europa, which brought two hundred and ninety-five guineas in 1871 went for six thousand four hundred guineas in the same month. On the other side we have Mr. C. T. Garland paying two thousand guineas in 1905 for Gainsborough's Portrait of Indiana Talbot, which was bought for nine hundred and eighty guineas a year later. Among the "downs" list the mid-Victorian artists hold a conspicuous place. As Mr. Roberts says: "Time has indeed had his revenge, and the Academy sensations of the fifties and sixties of the last century are now for the most part the despised and rejected of the auction room."

Mr. Nugent Monck, the Secretary of the English Drama Society, is arranging to revive, under the auspices of the Chester Archæological Society the cycle of fourteenth-century plays written for the Chester guilds. It is hoped that the representation will take place at Whitsuntide 1907.

LITERATURE

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH LITERATURE

The Oxford Treasury of English Literature. Vol. i. Old English to Jacobean. By G. E. HADOW and W. H. HADOW. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.)

UNABLE to believe seriously that we can produce any literature as good as our predecessors did, we turn our attention in the present age to the past and devote our main energies to making sure that our successors shall have an exact and complete knowledge of that. We will establish truth for them in the field of literature, let daylight into dark corners and see that their heritage shall reach them in good order. The day of "Elegant Extracts," when men were willing to take their literature in disconnected sips and bites like a woman's meal, is over. We have realised that a poem or a work of prose loses most, if not all, of its value if it is read or learned apart from its surroundings, detached from its contemporaries, without reference to the history of its growth from earlier efforts and its influence on later. The aim, that is, of students and teachers is to see English literature as a live and organic whole, a thing that grew, influenced by its "environment," by historical and social events; a thing with its roots in the national soul, drawing its nourishment from the national development, growing luxuriantly or feebly, stiffly or generously, according to the kind of nourishment it could receive at the different stages in its life. It is for that reason, no doubt, and not for any particular interest or sustenance they can offer to the modern mind that the sources and origins are searched and studied; that we read Beowulf and Cynewulf, Gower, Skelton or Wyatt. And more: to be logical we must hold that the subject cannot be fully understood unless even the inferior works of inferior writers are kept alive. They are part of the great plant: it is impossible to know it thoroughly without paying to these weak or withered shoots the due share of attention; and it has more than once occurred that such apparently negligible members have been the means whereby the main and splendid limbs attained their full glory.

That is the spirit in which Mr. and Miss Hadow have set to work to compile the Treasury of which the first volume is before us. Their aim is to indicate "the chief landmarks in the progress of English Literature." That means that to begin with, their title is a misnomer. A "treasury" of literature is, surely, a collection of its choicest things, not a swift survey of its history. We read a "treasury" purely for pleasure (which will be the greater if we know the history of the jewels): we study a book like this as a preparation for the proper appreciation of the contents of a treasury. This is an illustrated handbook to the study of the medals in our cabinet. And a good handbook it is. The subject, as the authors point out, had to be divided into chapters, and these chapters must each have either a main topic or a main chronological period: taken all in all, these chapter headings have been wisely chosen, and if the reader will bear in mind the authors' warning against trusting to hard and fast divisions in such a subject, he will not be misled by them. The first chapter is Old English Literature, beginning not with Caedmon but with Beowulf and containing translated selections also from Cynewulf and Alfred's Orosius. We come next to the lyric poems produced under the French influence that came in with and after the Conquest—"Sumer is icumen in," the "Spring Song" and Hendyng's Proverbs; and these are followed by the romance, the fabliau and the ballad. In chapter iv. we find the "Nationalist Reaction," with extracts from "Sir Gawayn;" and in chapters v. and vi. we have Chaucer, Gower, Lydgate and Occleve. To keep, for a moment, to poetry, chapter viii. gives us "The Revolt against Poetic Convention," which means Skelton and the ballads; and in chapter ix. we come to the influence of the Renaissance in Italy, with Wyatt, Surrey and Sackville. Spenser has chapter x.; the Elizabethan songs and sonnets chapter xi., and the last chapter gives "The Followers," by which the compilers mean the poets of the Jacobean decline, Giles Fletcher, Browne, Drayton, Chapman. Two chapters, meanwhile, have been given to prose; chapter vii. includes Mandeville to More; and chapter xii. Elizabethan Prose, the euphuists, Bacon and the colloquial school of Nash and Dekker. The selections occupy much more space than the introductions, and the whole book runs to three hundred and fifty-six crown octavo pages.

This, clearly, is no treasury. A treasury of English literature from Old English to Jacobean without a line of "Pearl," a word of Raleigh, or Hooker, or Burton, a stanza of Peele, or Lodge, or "A. W.," with only three songs of Campion and one of Fletcher?

The idea is plainly absurd; and we dwell upon this matter of the title because it seems to us that the error is likely to mislead a great many who might profit by the book if they accepted it for what it is, an illustrated handbook, and a good one. It does well what it professes (elsewhere than in the title) to do. It gives a clear outline of the history of the subject; and it pays due attention to the influence of foreign literatures on our own, a matter that handbooks are apt to omit.

The subjects of the chapters as given above will show that no complaint can be made with regard to this part of the work. The authors show, with surprising clearness considering the small space in which they had to move, how the Old English literature of saga and chronicle contained the lyric seed which was ripened by the French influence after the Conquest; and how, before we became too Gallic, there was a national reaction after Poitiers which gave us such work as the romance of "Sir Gawayn." They do not, to our surprise, mention "Pearl," which, whether or not by the same author, forms part of the same manuscript, and is at least as interesting and important a landmark in our progress. They do not, for reasons given in the preface, do more than touch on "Piers Plowman." They proceed to show how out of the two tendencies, the English and the French, rose Chaucer, who drew from Italy the final breath of his greatness. Then, or contemporaneously, came the fore-runners of the Reformation, Gower, Lydgate and Occleve, "ethical, political or religious"; to be followed by the second revolt, that against court influences and established forms in poetry, which gave us Skelton and the ballads. And so we come to the great outburst, when the sun of the Italian Renaissance dawned over us, and the singers in the first glimmer, Wyatt and Surrey, heralded the matchless chorus of the dawn. And the story is told with just and apt criticism, wide and deep knowledge, and plenty of fact.

The only question is: Is not such work as this robbed of its due effect by the cramped space allowed it? Here is a volume that attempts to take in the whole of English literature from Beowulf to the Jacobean decline, and is scarcely bigger than Mr. Pollard's "English Miracle Plays." The omissions, as we have incidentally pointed out, are necessarily vast in quantity and supreme in beauty and interest: the introductions, despite the care and knowledge with which they are written, are inevitably insufficient and a little dictatorial; the selections, though chosen with fine judgment, are brief and not wholly representative. For instance, who could gain a fair idea of the Elizabethan lyrics from twenty pages of extracts? The book is not one to be "enjoyed"; it is for study, and if a matter is to be studied, it had better be studied at greater length than this. In succeeding volumes the compilers will surely find their difficulties increased. Volume ii. is to deal with the drama up to the Jacobean age; volume iii. to "take up the record at the time of Milton and continue it to that of Tennyson and Browning." The result will be a primer: very likely a better primer than any other that exists; but the authors are worthy of more scope than a primer gives them.

In conclusion, there are one or two points to which attention might be drawn. When space is so valuable, there is no room for sentences like this concerning Langland:

As we think of the Fabliaux beside his work we can imagine the Roman courtiers flocking to an improvisation of Statius, and Juvenal with bent brows watching them as they pass.

Why should the spelling of Wyatt, Surrey and Sackville have been modernised, when due reverence for Spenser has left his spelling unchanged? More space should have been devoted to the development of prose from the chronicle to Bacon; and we must take exception to a sentence in the introduction to chapter vii. Speaking of Chaucer's plots and persons, the authors say:

If any prose writer of the time could have built upon his foundation the English Novel would have dated from the fourteenth century. The chance was lost by the historical accident that Mandeville lived half a century too early, that his work was contemporary with the beginning, not the end, of Chaucer's life.

No good ever came of such criticism as that. Last, the use of "euphuistic" or "euphuism" according to "our modern habit of calling mean things by high-sounding names" is an inexact use, and should not have been mentioned in a book of this kind. We are inclined to agree with the authors of "The King's English" that when George Eliot (in a passage quoted by Mr. and Miss Hadow in a footnote) wrote: "the workhouse, euphuistically called the college," she made a slip, and intended to write "euphemistically."

THE MASTERPIECE OF SOPHOCLES

F. Schubert's edition of the Oedipus Tyrannus of Sophocles. Re-edited by Prof. LUDWIG HÜTER. (Leipsic and Vienna: Tempisky, 2s. 6d.)

THE Oedipus Tyrannus may fairly be regarded as the most interesting of all the dramas which ancient Hellas has transmitted to us. It was selected by Aristotle as the model tragedy, and it is not only full of magnificent passages, but in its delineation of character and above all in its ingenuity of construction it is the masterpiece of the Attic stage. But it must be borne in mind that in the judgment of the great critic of Stagira dramatic vraisemblance is requisite only within the scope of the drama on which it is engaged. Everything which lies outside the framework of the play may be disregarded. Thus, the modern imitators of the Oedipus Tyrannus, Dryden, Corneille, Voltaire, endeavour to account for the fact, to which Sophocles never adverts, that for some sixteen years separating the death of Laius from the opening scene of the drama, Oedipus seems never to have questioned Jocasta, his mother, whom he has unwittingly espoused, concerning the fate of her former husband, Laius, who has died by the hand of his son Oedipus.

But within the framework of the play the dramatist's art is most carefully exercised. Nothing could be more natural and at the same time powerfully impressive than the scene in which Tiresias is stung by the taunts of Oedipus into denouncing him as the murderer of Laius. At first the seer only makes covert allusion to the tragic tale how Oedipus unwittingly slew his father and espoused his mother—"never will I reveal my secret—that I say not thine," and, again, by a delicate use of Sophoclean irony, "thou blamest my temper, but what thou hast in thine own bosom thou knowest not." Here Oedipus would understand the words as meaning "the wrath that thou harbourst," but the audience would see the real meaning of the seer's words "the wife thou hast in thy bosom." Very similar in expression is a quaint passage in Locke On the Human Understanding:

For though a man can with satisfaction enough own a no-very handsome wife in his bosom, yet who is bold enough openly to avow that he has espoused a falsehood, and received into his breast so ugly a thing as a lie?

At last Tiresias explicitly arraigns Oedipus, who replies with bitter taunts, Night is thy nursing-mother, so that thou art impotent to hurt me or any man that looks upon the Day.

The right reading in this passage (374) is certainly μαίας not μῆας, which cannot mean anything but "one night" not "uniform, endless," like the Latin una.

It is when Jocasta thinks she can relieve her husband of all disquietude that she strikes the first note of alarm in his mind. She tells him how he cannot have slain Laius, because Laius was destined according to an oracle to be slain by his own son: now his only son was exposed and destroyed in infancy, and Laius was slain by robbers "at the meeting of three roads." These are the disquieting words. Oedipus remembers how on his journey from Corinth he slew an old man with whom he had a quarrel at the meeting of three roads, and subsequent questioning confirms his fears. But they are all set at rest by the arrival of a messenger from Corinth announcing to Jocasta the death of Polybus, the supposed father of Oedipus. She sends for Oedipus, who greets her with the words:

Dearest wife Jocasta, why hast thou summoned me?

This is the last time he calls her by her name. When the terrible truth comes out and she hangs herself, Oedipus designates as "her that is within"—a terribly true touch of nature. The scene of their triumph over the falsification of the oracle, just before the peripeteia, so justly praised by Aristotle, in which Oedipus discovers his true parentage, has another exquisite touch. Oedipus still fears the second predicted horror, union with his mother. Here is the scene in Jebb's translation:

OE. All these bold words of thine would have been well, were not my mother living: but as it is I must needs fear.

JO. Howbeit thy father's death is a great sign to cheer us.

OE. Great, I know: but my fear is of her who lives. Loxias has said that I was doomed to espouse my own mother, and to shed with my own hands my father's blood. Wherefore my home in Corinth was long kept by me afar: with happy event indeed—yet still 'tis sweet to see the face of parents.

Could anything be more graceful, more princely? When regretting his enforced absence from the home of his reputed parents, he is careful to advert to the happy lot which gave him his spouse and his throne in Thebes. And could there be a more terrible irony? While he speaks of his long exile from the house of his parents in Corinth he is looking into his mother's eyes in Thebes. There is a certain hardness in Jocasta's exultation over the supposed father's death, but such a feeling is very natural in a woman just relieved of a terrible apprehension.

The language of Oedipus and Jocasta is princely throughout. When he asks her to describe Laius her reply is:

Tall, and with newly sable-silvered head.

And this is (slightly abridged) the passage (in Jebb's splendid version) wherein he justifies the act by which he blinded himself:

After baring such a stain upon me, was I to look with steady eyes on this folk? No, verily: no, were there yet a way to choke the fount of hearing, I had not spared to make a fast prison of this wretched frame, that so I should have known nor sight nor sound. Alas, Cithaeron, why hadst thou a shelter for me? Ah, Polybus, ah, Corinth, and thou that wast called the ancient house of my fathers, how seeming-fair was I your nursling and what ills were festering beneath! O marriage rites, ye gave me birth, and when ye had brought me forth, again ye bore children to your child, ye created an incestuous kinship of fathers, brothers, sons, brides, wives, mothers, yea, all the foulest shame that is wrought among men!

The edition before us has no explanatory notes, but it has a long introduction in German dealing with the origin of Tragedy, the life and work of Sophocles, the metres and staging of the play, followed by an analysis of the same and some remarks on the characters of a rather sketchy and conventional kind. For instance, no note is taken of the fact that Creon is very much less truculent than the Creon of the Antigone. After the disclosure, he approaches Oedipus (1422) with the words:

I have not come in mockery, Oedipus, nor to reproach thee with any bygone fault;

but further on (1445) he cannot refrain from something like a taunt:

OE. Will ye then seek a response on behalf of such a wretch as I am?

Cr. Aye, for thou wilt surely now put faith in the god.

And afterwards (1523):

Crave not to be master in all things: for the mastery which thou didst win has not followed thee through life.

The text is very conservative, and in that respect is much to be preferred to the Teubner (Dindorf-Mekler) edition, which often corrects readings almost demonstrably sound, e.g., ἐκπερνούμενος (794), which is proved to be right by a passage in Aelian which says that ἀστροπος ἐκπερνούσθαι was a proverb like our "to shake off the dust of one's feet." And there are many similar places in which perfectly right readings are rejected and replaced by tasteless conjectures. Professor Hüter's book shows no knowledge of the monumental edition of Jebb nor of any British work on Sophocles.

LOCUS REFRIGERII

Selected Poems. By NORA CHESSEON. In 5 vols. (Alston Rivers, 5s. net.)

THE publishers of these selected poems have followed the plan adopted by another firm in issuing Mr. Sturge Moore's poems. The five volumes are little paper-covered booklets put together in a cardboard case, very dainty and chaste. We opened them with expectations of pleasure, and were not disappointed. Nora Hopper, or Nora Chesson, was a poet whose name was always appearing—and readers were always glad to see it. In the corner of some newspaper or magazine would nestle a little poem, and to read it was to be transported at once out of the world of newspapers and noise into a place of refreshment, a cool and shadowy place, of silence, gentle regret, faint beauty, above all of coolness. It was hard—impossible even—to imagine the poems of Nora Hopper being "set up" by live printers in real type, dabbed with ink, banged together in "formes," sent hurtling through roaring, rattling presses, distributed by carts and hawked with "all the winners" by newspaper boys. The Pixy-folk set them, and the ink was honey-dew. And so the name of Nora Hopper came to be a name one regarded with affection. It was the key to a peaceful, grey garden, a magic wand to waft one through leagues of air to a paradise that is not of this world.

There are, by a rough division, two kinds of poetry. There is the poetry that is a staff, a weapon, a strong right arm; and there is the poetry that is a rest, a refreshment, a means of escape. The one men take down into battle with them, and use: it is their strength in difficulty, their guide in uncertainty. And that, no doubt, is the greatest poetry. It is useful in life, because it has mastered life: the great imagination has expressed in a dozen lines all the troubles, the woes, the joys, the triumphs and the failures, of the men that live life. It transcends life because it embraces the whole of it. The other kind of poetry men take away with them into hiding. It is not a weapon of battle, but a means of escape; it helps only by wafting the mind away for a while to a place of rest and peace and dreams, whence it may return, if not invigorated, at least soothed.

Such is the poetry of Nora Hopper, the Irish poet of whom death has robbed us all too soon. And those who turn to those five slim volumes will find themselves in that locus refrigerii for which even the stoutest and the most eager crave now and then. The selections have been admirably made, and show her art and spirit at their best. This is not great poetry, the poetry of a great mind that has mastered life: it is the sweet, haunting, wistful poetry of one who lived apart, dreaming in a twilight world. It rarely excites. Only once, as we turned the pages, scanning old friends, did we find our blood flowing quicker, and that was when we came upon the poem called "June":

Dark red roses in a honeyed wind swinging,
Silk-soft hollyhock, coloured like the moon;
Larks high overhead lost in light, and singing;
That's the way of June.

Dark red roses in the warm wind falling,
Velvet leaf by velvet leaf, all the breathless noon;
Far-off sea-waves calling, calling, calling;
That's the way of June.

Sweet as scarlet strawberry under wet leaves hidden,
Honeyed as the damask rose, lavish as the moon,
Shedding lovely light on things forgotten, hope forbidden—
That's the way of June.

That has the true fire in it, the fire that burned too faintly in Nora Hopper to allow her greatness. But, that notwithstanding, she offers something that no one, even of her fellow "Celts," has to give, a special note, a special charm of her own; a faint note, a subtle charm not always easily caught, but enough to mark her as an individual singer. Analysed, part of it will be found to lie in her use of accent, which is extraordinarily happy:

Hear, Sleep, dear Sleep, ere my song be ended,
Gather me thy fairest flowers a soft dream to make
For my love—a dream of scent and of music blended.
Ay, and let me kiss the dream for the dreamer's sake.
O Sleep, blow sleep-dust upon his pillow
Till he dreams it is my breast, and to dream is fain;
Let him think it is my hair, not thy branch of willow,
Dark against the little light through the rain-blurred pane.

And that command of accent gave her a power over irregular metres which is none too common. Perhaps the best example is that "Phæacia" which shows not only her power over metre and rhythm but much of the thought, or dream, that makes her poetry what it is:

Let us go hence and find those islands fair,
Go hence and take no care
For Lydian flutes that falter far away.
Let us go hence and take no thought for all
The Linus-songs whose long lamentings fall
Like rain, like rain round our departing feet.
These songs are oversweet
And we are weary of the homespun day,
And we are sick for shadows: let's away,
Link hands and let us go, ere we grow old . . .
Your hand is cold;
Loose hands and let us go, ere we grow old,
To mistier meadows and a softer sky,
There in Phæacia to live and die.

So she dreamed, coming back to earth and its hard facts with a brave effort. Not that her dreaming robbed her of a power to see what was about her. She is often strikingly vivid, catching, as in her poems to the months, the very spirit of the thing, or painting a scene, as in "A White Night," so intensely that it can never be forgotten.

White stand the houses out in the moonless midnight.
Here and there a window lighted yet stands plain,
Strange as a lifted eyelid in a face that slumbers.
The wakefulness behind it, is it grief or sin or pain?

Cart on cart moves stealthily, feet on feet follow;
Wheels plod on reluctantly, creaking as they go;
A snatch of crazy song beats down a baby's crying;
But over all and each the silence falls like snow.

All sounds flower slowly from the heart of silence,
Not as in the daylight, shrieked at ears a-strain:
Harsh sounds come less harshly, and fade before they trouble
Ears that hear them come and go, and peace grow whole again.

One by one the fixed lights grow paler and grow fewer;
One by one man quenches what he lit; the stars remain.
The gray sky whitens; with a shudder it is daylight;
Cocks are crowing sleep away, and day brings rain.

But, throughout, her poetical attitude is that of one who bears with life rather than enjoys it. It will be noticed in reading the selections how many of the poems deal with death, tenderly and sweetly, rather as the reconciler, the reuniter, than the parter of loving hearts, the rest—lonely perhaps for a time, but only for a time—that shall prepare for a final fruition.

The one false word of life is ICHABOD,
The glory is not departed;
They lie who say it, being heavy-hearted.
The glory was here; the glory is hid with God.
All glories that we lose, or we forego,
Some day shall find us, this I surely know.

All lost and lovely things of long ago,
Whose living fire grew cold
Upon the altars that we built of old,
Shall come and warm again
The gray and empty places of our pain,
Visible gods and fair
Breathing immortal promise in the air
That, being past sunset, lets all colours go,

Gladness and sadness that we put away,
And every dim belief of yesterday
For which we do not pray,
Grown old and cold and tired with long desire,
Grown stiff with kneeling in a winter's night
In the ghost-ridden place of old delight,
Blowing the ashes gray
Of youth's extinguished fire,
Grace that we dare not hope for,
Good that we blindly grope for—
A sweet and piteous host
Of lovelinesses lost.

It only remains to add that Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer has written a valuable and temperate little critical study of Nora Chesson's work as an introduction to the selection, and that there is, for those who need it, a glossary of Irish words and allusions. Mr. Hueffer puts the matter of these Irish words with amiable bluntness: Nora Chesson, he says, sometimes called a girl a "colleen" because "the flesh is weak . . . or more often because the line in which it occurred needed a dissyllable." Taking a number of test cases, we find that "maiden" would usually have done just as well as "colleen." Mrs. Chesson chose the Irish word because she was an Irish woman, and her mind a peculiarly Irish mind.

SALMON FISHING

Salmon Fishing. By W. EARL HODGSON. (Black, 7s. 6d. net.)

IN his Prefatory Note Mr. Hodgson deprecates the view that his book should be regarded as a compilation of writings already published; yet this is exactly the impression which it leaves upon the reader. It is a compilation, with the component parts very disconnected and very unequal in merit. It is a Fly Book, a Blue Book, a Treatise on Salmon Fishing and, we had almost added, a Novelette, all bound up together. Roughly speaking, it may be divided into four parts. First, and best, come the coloured illustrations of salmon flies; seventy-six patterns of flies specially tied for the purpose by Malloch of Perth. Then follow several discursive chapters on salmon and salmon fishing, full of speculations and controversy, in the course of which Mr. Hodgson asks innumerable questions and suggests various solutions for most of the problems touching upon the life history of the salmon and the methods of catching him. This leads us on to the third part of the book, where the author inquires into the state of our salmon rivers, and gives us a hundred and fifty pages of letters from authorities in all parts of the British Empire, in his endeavour to answer the question, "Are our salmon rivers declining?" Fourth, we have a very interesting and instructive chapter on "Storage and Passes," which concludes a somewhat pessimistic review of our rivers with the hopeful statement: "Any river that is equipped with storage and passes will speedily recover." Interspersed with this more solid material are lighter pages on river and loch fishing, and a discussion of the spirit of the chase; whilst the book concludes with an amusing account, reproduced from the Cornhill, of an adventure at "The Otter's Stone Pool" on the Tay.

"Salmon fishing, though an art, is scarcely a fine art," wrote Mr. Senior, many years ago: be that as it may, Mr. Hodgson now deals with it as a science, and sets himself to work out many of the problems that it suggests. Chiefly is he interested in the discussion of the questions: "Do salmon in fresh water ever, before spawning, take a lure with intent to eat? and, if they do, how often?" Mounted on a white butterfly, he rides full tilt against the serried ranks of the men of science, brushing lightly aside, though he will not "absolutely reject," the great mass of negative evidence which goes to prove "the scientific dogma" that salmon do not feed in fresh water. He scoffs at Dr. Barton's theory that salmon rise at the fly only when they have been running and are fatigued. Possibly they rise from curiosity, possibly from sheer playfulness; but plainly Mr. Hodgson inclines to the view that they rise with "gustatory intent," though he has to admit that this is not yet proven, and decides that "the ultimate verdict of science will be a compromise."

His own contribution to the argument is based on the analogy between salmon and trout. Salmon rise, as a rule, particularly well at or about sundown: so do trout. It is agreed that trout rise then for the purpose of feeding: trout and salmon are near of kin: and therefore it is quite conceivable that salmon should have, like the trout, a regular hour for feeding, or trying to feed, their "evening rise." Indeed it is not easy to believe that while the trout are rising to feed the salmon are only rising in frolic. But he feels bound to admit that this habit may take its rise "in racial reminiscence rather than in actual need." It is interesting to compare this with the other side of the question in New Zealand and Tasmania, where the trout "have acquired a sea-going habit precisely analogous to our salmon, and are taken in nets at sea of great size and with a silver marine livery." From this Mr. Hodgson queries: "Is it possible that salmon and trout are in reality fish of the same race, sprung from a uniform stock? If this be so, we can readily understand why, when in river or lake, salmon rise during the daily feeding-times of the trout." Many salmon fishers, however, would reply to this that salmon undoubtedly rise best in the morning; Mr. Hodgson himself admits that "especially in spring, the heat of the day is good": and no sooner does one lay down any general rule for salmon than one is immediately met by any number of exceptions.

"In all parts of the United Kingdom," writes Mr. Hodgson, "one finds a general belief that the salmon are not to be long in the land." This is very pessimistic; truly "the burden of Egypt" seems to be come upon us, and we are reminded of the words of Isaiah:

The fishes also shall mourn, and all they that cast angle into the brooks shall lament, and they that spread nets upon the waters shall languish.

But this is not a new cry, and Mr. Hodgson is by no means the first to attempt to grapple with the question. As long ago as July 1860 a Royal Commission was appointed "to inquire into the Salmon Fisheries of England and Wales, with the view of increasing the supply of a valuable article of food for the public." It reported the fisheries then "to be in a lamentable state of depression"; but they have since been raised into a valuable source of food-supply. The Report of the Royal Commission of 1902 is much more cheerful in tone:

In Scotland the evidence brought before us does not seem to indicate that in that country there has been any serious diminution in the abundance of salmon, although in many rivers, especially in the less important rivers, the number of fish taken by rods seems to have decreased.

As to the English and Welsh Salmon Fisheries:

while the general tendency during the period of '16 years is, no doubt, downwards, the actual falling off, comparing 1885 and 1900, is not so great as the representations of many witnesses would have led us to expect.

Indeed, the three best years occur towards the end of the period under review, viz., '91, '92, and '95. We quote last from the annual report of proceedings under the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Acts, 1905:

The evidence with regard to the salmon fishing season is somewhat conflicting. From the returns of the Boards of Conservators it would appear that it was not satisfactory. On the other hand, the return of the quantity of English and Welsh salmon sent to Billingsgate Market is greater than in any of the nine preceding years.

Blue Books as a rule are not given to optimism, and we consider the reports of the salmon rivers distinctly hopeful. Moreover, when we recollect that, beside the reports of Royal Commissions and the reports issued annually by the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, and the Scottish Salmon Fisheries, we have the monumental work of Augustus Grimble on "The Salmon Rivers of the British Isles," it might seem a little unnecessary for Mr. Hodgson to have given himself so much trouble in collecting afresh conflicting expressions of opinion about our salmon rivers.

After a collection of letters dealing with all our salmon rivers, we are left to draw our own conclusions. On the whole it seems probable that the actual quantity of salmon caught annually shows increase rather than diminution; that the nets injuriously affect the rod fishing except in wet seasons; and that the Irish rivers are in a thoroughly unsatisfactory condition, owing to inveterate poaching, poisoning and pollution. Incidentally we gather that better results are obtained by protecting spawning salmon on the natural redds than by stripping them of their spawn and rearing it in hatcheries; that otters and crows, cormorants, herons and other birds which prey upon smolts and salmon eggs are greatly on the increase; and that many a pass has been erected at great expense, which has proved absolutely useless owing to the ignorance of the designer.

We entirely agree with Mr. Hodgson that the root of the difficulty is the water-supply, improved methods of drainage having completely altered the conditions of our rivers. He gives a most favourable account of the experiments in artificial storage on the Helmsdale, in which he is supported by the last Report of the Scottish Salmon Fisheries. Something of the same kind was tried on a smaller scale in 1888 on the Grimersta river in the Island of Lewis, when Mr. Naylor and two friends caught with fly the remarkable bag of three hundred and thirty-three salmon and seventy-one sea trout in the last six days of August, as the result of making an artificial spate in the river from Loch Langabhat.

Space would fail us to discuss the many other topics of interest which are touched upon by Mr. Hodgson, such as the eyesight of salmon, and the way in which they are affected by the temperature of the water, by floods, and by violent disturbances in their neighbourhood, such as blasting or stoning the pool. It is too early yet to say whether the Thames will again become an important salmon river; and we doubt whether salmon will ever again become so plentiful that the Act of King John's reign, which imposed penalties for using the young salmon smolt for manure, will have to be put into force; nor are apprentices likely to complain again, if ever they did, that salmon figures too often in their bill of fare. But it is quite plain that the salmon of our islands are not likely to die out now through any lack of interest: and Mr. Hodgson's enthusiasm for the cause will do much to spread amongst the general public the interest in our salmon industry, scientific as well as practical, which has increased so much of late in angling quarters.

He would be difficult to please who could quarrel with the Model Set of Flies for Scotland, Ireland, England and Wales, selected by Mr. Malloch and the author. The illustrations are admirable, presumably executed by Mr. Mortimer Menpes, the artist of "The Book of Flies" included in Mr. Hodgson's former work on "Trout Fishing." They are far in advance of any coloured illustrations of salmon flies yet given to the public, but we would suggest that in another edition a list of the flies might with advantage be appended, from which the reader could refer to the plates. The seventy-six flies do not, of course, pretend to be exhaustive: on the other hand many people will think the selection unnecessarily complete.

"CRICKET THE KING"

Great Batsmen: their Methods at a Glance. By G. W. BELDAM and C. B. FRY. Illustrated by 600 Action-Photographs. (Macmillan, 21s. net.)

Great Bowlers and Fielders: their Methods at a Glance. By G. W. BELDAM and C. B. FRY. Illustrated by 464 Action-Photographs. (Macmillan, 21s. net.)

The Complete Cricketer. By A. E. KNIGHT. With 50 illustrations. (Methuen, 7s. (d. net.))

The M.C.C. in South Africa. By P. F. WARNER. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

Of the four books before us two are obviously designed for the amateur cricketer's shelves; the third should find a place on every cricketer's table. The value of the first two—and we think their practical value very slight—lies in the illustrations; that of the third—and we think it considerable from every point of view save the pictorial—in the text. In the "Key-notes" which are prefixed to "Great Batsmen" the authors say:

In short, the book is founded upon Action-Photography and Actual Experience [the capitals, we imagine, are Mr. C. B. Fry's]. It is hoped that the result will prove new and instructive not only to those who are interested in how the leading batsmen play, but also to those who wish to learn the art of batting.

And again:

It is necessary to state with some emphasis that in the selection of the series of photographs of individual batsmen, and in the arrangement of them under "Individualities" and "Strokes Illustrated," there is no differentiation on a basis of merit. That is to say, it must not be supposed that the batsmen included in "Individualities" were picked out as more worthy of individual treatment than some who are distributed under the several divisions of "Strokes Illustrated;" nor that those who are arranged under a particular stroke were selected as being more skilful exponents of it than those who do not appear. Selection and arrangement have been largely determined by the success and completeness of the series of photographs of each player.

We do not think that any one who understands cricket would consider that the authors' hopes have been realised. Instruction in cricket—in batting or in bowling—cannot be conveyed in this way, and it is no exaggeration to say that the unskilled player would learn more from a hundred and fifty pages of Mr. Knight's book than from the whole of the thousand and sixty-four photographs contained between the covers of Messrs. Beldam and Fry's beautiful volumes. If the authors considered that their scheme was likely to prove "instructive . . . to those who wish to learn the art of batting," none but the best batsmen should have been included, and where particular strokes are illustrated none but the best exponents of those strokes should have been selected. To determine inclusion or exclusion by caprice, by the success or failure of photographs or sets of photographs, is to destroy any practical value the books might have possessed and to render them nugatory in every respect save the photographic. If the negatives of the photographs of L. C. H. Palaret—there are only eight—had been unsatisfactory, we take it he would have been omitted entirely from Messrs. Beldam and Fry's picture-gallery. Yet far more instruction might be derived from watching him play a single innings than from watching Clem Hill, to whom nineteen plates are devoted, play fifteen. And R. E. Foster, to whom eighteen plates are assigned, would teach the spectator more of cricket in thirty minutes than Victor Trumper, who is given twenty plates, would in thirty years! Why are there only nine photographs of Tyldesley and thirteen of Hayward against twenty-four of C. B. Fry? Perhaps because Mr. Fry is the more accomplished poseur. But did a faint sense of the fitness of things steal over him when he hid his face behind his arm in posing for the picture which ornaments the cover of "Great Batsmen"? Mr. Beldam, we note, figures seldom: his modesty is akin to that of Mr. Knight, who does not admit a single photograph of himself into his book.

Again, the action-photographs, with perhaps one or two exceptions, cannot be said to represent the players in their natural actions: they have stood to the photographer, always endeavouring to "look their best." The result is not helpful to the man or youth who picks up the volumes for instruction. Sometimes—more often, we suspect, than the authors themselves admit—the ball bowled to the batsman was not the one he would have countered with the stroke he had been asked to illustrate: compelled to drive, he would have preferred to cut the ball received; compelled to cut, he would have preferred to drive. The resulting photograph is not fair to the batsman. Nor is it quite fair to the purchaser. Cricket cannot be taught in this fashion. Messrs. Beldam and Fry may plead that time did not enable them to obtain natural photographs; if this were so, the defective negatives should never have been printed. You cannot teach a man how to ride by depicting another on a wooden horse.

Substantially the same objection may be urged against the volume on "Great Bowlers and Fielders: their Methods at a Glance." True, these methods are in most cases admirably shown, but of what use is this to the man who buys the book in order to obtain an insight into the real thing? Will attempted imitation of W. G. Grace or Ranjitsinji, of Spofforth or Hirst, make a great batsman or a great bowler? We think not. No two men can play the same kind of stroke or bowl the same kind of ball in the same way. Careful tuition will do much: but a man's style, in cricket as in most other things, is the expression of his individuality.

We have left ourselves insufficient space to do justice to the third book on our list: "The Complete Cricketer." Mr. Knight—a young Leicestershire professional—is a delightful cricketer to watch, and his book affords as much entertainment as his play, though much of the humour is not intentional, for he is wholly serious when he tells us that W. G. Grace "represents cricket as the Pope represents Christianity, not as St. Francis represents it," and speaks of Victor Trumper's play, with its "luminant masterfulness, yet with the unlaboured easy naturalness of a falling tear, or rather showers from the sunny lips of summer"! We expected to find a reference to "Euripides the human" in the near neighbourhood, but were disappointed. These, however, are minor defects. Mr. Knight is new to literature, his education has been, we believe, largely self-acquired, and he is anxious, as most young authors are anxious, to display his learning. But he writes with enthusiasm and with the knowledge that comes of experience in the best possible school: a county which invariably figures near the bottom of the championship list.

Starting with an excellent outline of the early history and development of the game, Mr. Knight gives us chapters on batting, bowling, fielding, captaincy, umpiring, cricket on farther shores, players of the past and present, and modern cricket and its problems, with two appendices: the rules as revised and amended by the M.C.C., and an invaluable glossary of cricket terms, from which the uninitiated may learn the meaning of "donkey-drops," "googlies," "rabbits," "sitters," "trealers," and so on. His remarks on the amateur v. professional question are interesting: the attitude taken up by a section of the public and by many of our leading newspapers too often approaches snobbishness, and the professional is seldom heard. The chapter on captaincy is the best we have read, and those on batting and bowling are instructive. We have heard many good cricketers object to a batsman criticising bowling, but it cannot be denied that he is in the best position to judge of the merits and demerits of a particular ball. Mr. Knight is at one with us in our view that it is futile to attempt to teach a man to bowl by means of pictorial illustrations. The great bowler is born: by tuition you may improve his deliveries, make them more destructive of the batsman's peace of mind, but you cannot make a great, or even a good, bowler of a man who has no natural ability for the work. We entirely agree with his protest against the view that fielding is a decaying art. To watch R. E. Foster in the slips, L. G. Wright at point, Rhodes at cover-point, or Denton in the long field, is to watch four of the finest fielders we have ever had. On the whole, we think the average level of fielding amongst the county teams remarkably high: we do not wish to see a better all round field than G. L. Jessop. Mr. Knight's book is one which, put into the hands of youth, will make cricketers of many who, but for its stimulus, might never have pursued their early triumphs. In its way it bids fair to become a cricket classic; we should like to see it in every school library.

Of Mr. Warner's "The M.C.C. in South Africa" little need be said. It is pretentious and dull, and we think the letters reprinted might well have been allowed a last resting-place in the columns of the paper in which they originally appeared.

A WAIF

A POET dreamed me; but he woke,
And with the slumber-thread
Of Memory, the morning broke,
And, lo, the vision fled!

Henceforth a homeless wanderer
It is my fate to be.
Till Memory of things that were
Re-clothe and shelter me.

JOHN B. TARR.

SOME OLD PROVERBS

IN the days before cheap editions, penny posts and daily newspapers, if a man wished his wisdom to be known and remembered, he had perforce to enshrine it briefly and pithily. Hence our rich proverbial lore, packed with philosophy and knowledge of human nature, yet clear to the humblest understanding, as it had to be when its only means of propagation was the tongue of pedlars and village folk. Nowadays, if a man has an idea half so rich and suggestive as some of these old saws, he makes a treatise on it, or at least a serious novel, and it is reviewed as "an earnest effort to grapple with the problem," and is dead in half a year. The germ of several volumes of worthy Discourses can be seen in the vigorous terseness of: "Ye wald do little for God an the Devil were dead."

To study a collection of proverbs is to take a bird's-eye view of human nature; the unanimity on some points in different parts of the earth speaks of the touch of nature that makes us kin. This is specially true of food; Punch only topped the chorus with his: "Feed the brute." The old Hebrew had been before him with: "Spread the table and contention will cease"; the Englishman with: "An hungry man is an angry man"; and the South American Indian with: "The dus' shouldn't settle on de meal-box," and "It's a mighty deaf nigger dat don't year de dinner-ho'n."

Physicians fare badly in proverbial lore. There is a mystery about the sayings applied to the medical profession which lends them a dark fascination. "Do not," says an Oriental maxim with much earnestness but no explanation, "Do not dwell in a city whose governor is a Physician." Equally libellous, and equally subtle is: "Honour a Physician before thou hast need of him." Or . . . what? asks the mind. "God healeth," sighs a Cornishman, with perhaps a fee to pay, "and the Physician hath the thanks."

The Law and the Church fare just as badly, for Truth must dispense with her crinoline if she is to fit into a proverb. "The Law is not the same at morning and night" is the most kindly remark to be found applied to it; and the Church must not cavil (for fear of going further and faring worse) at: "Take heed of an Ox before, an Ass behind, and a Monk on all sides." Although the proverb-makers waste no praise on the law, they are not much inclined towards the quality of mercy. "He that gives honour to his enemy is like to an ass," mildly observes one, who evidently wishes to be as little rude as may be. Seven hundred years ago, Sa'adi sat in his Rose-Garden and wrote: "Show no mercy to a foe in his weakness, since when he is strong he will show thee none," quite the wrong sort of reflection for a Rose-Garden. He found an echo five hundred years later in England:

When you are an Anvil, hold you still,
When you are a Hammer, strike your fill.

The descent to Avernus is easy in other languages than Latin. "It's easier to fall than to climb," says an old proverb; and the further West has it: "De top ob de hill is harder to find dan de bottom." Virginian wisdom is delightful, and not always in accordance with tradition. For instance, it does not believe that the shorn lamb has the wind tempered for it, but rather that: "De hail-stones don't pick de hard heads to drop on." It would be interesting to know the real solution of this weird saying: "Nigger wid a pocket-han'kcher better be looked atter," but perhaps ignorance is bliss in this case. The conduct of life is not neglected in the darkie's lore; he thinks that: "Looks won't do ter split rails wid"; and that: "Youk'n hide de fier, but w'at you gwine do wid de smoke?" a question which criminals would do well to consider; but he goes deeper, and joins hands with Poly-crates of the emerald ring, when he counsels: "Watch out w'en you'er gittin all you want. Fattenin' hogs ain't in luck." The last five words have the force of a sledge-hammer.

Fools monopolise a great number of proverbs, but, as a rule, without much rancour. "Twa fools in ane house is ower many," plaintively remarks an unknown with whom most people will agree; there is a feeling tone about his exclamation, as of personal experience of such a household. An alarming suggestion of infection is contained in: "One fool makes a hundred"; but the antidote follows in: "He is a fool who is not melancholy once a day."

"Wheresoever you see your kindred, make much of your friends," is a dark saying; but if family affection is not enjoined, neighbourly affection is to be qualified: "Love thy neighbour—but pull not down thy hedge." No one will deny that "the best remedy against an ill man is much ground between both."

Children do not figure very prominently among the elder proverbs; but it is occasionally evident that they made their mark even in the days when they were brought up in suppression. Most people have experienced the desperate calm, the inward, frozen "Kismet!" with which one hears a small voice clearly proclaiming most private matters.

Children pick up words as pigeons pease,
And utter them again as God shall please.

Some poor soul had passed through dreadful moments before arriving at the conclusion that earthly intervention was useless and only Heaven could help!

It is a crude way of mentioning poetical licence to say: "Painters and poets have leave to lie," and shows a lack of sympathy for the sensitive artistic temperament. Yet without this bluntness these sayings would lose half their charm. They all bear the impress of life and experience upon them; they have been forged by sincere emotion, and are the outcome of many thousands of human lives. Who could resist the directness, the penetration, and the careless touch of honest democracy, in the simple sentence: "Kings and Bares oft worries their keepers"?

There are many books on the classes and the masses of all countries and ages; but there has never been a truer solution of the surface difference which has always separated them, and must separate them to the end, than in the kindly tolerance of the unknown wise man, who, untrammelled by grammar, said (may his memory live for ever!): "Courtesie is cumbersom to them that kens it not."

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

HAZLITT AND SAINTE-BEUVE

It now seems to be an accepted idea that the English mind has ever been wanting in critical power. But, as a matter of history, the modern art of criticism is of English origin. It was one of the branches of portraiture founded in this country in that age of invention, the eighteenth century. Hogarth was the first painter, I believe, to depict natural gesture; Richardson was certainly the first novelist to portray the subtler lights and shadows of passion, and Dr. Johnson was the first critic to delineate the complexion of genius, and to trace its substance and form in the lives and characters of authors, before studying in their works its manifestation and general value. By definitely connecting, in a manner adumbrated by Dryden, the art of biography with the art of appreciation, the writer of the "Lives of the Poets" did that which it has been given to few men in any era to accomplish: he elaborated a new literary form. Moreover, it is one which, as M. Anatole France has observed, may yet end in absorbing many of the older forms. This event is no doubt a remote one. The modern art of criticism supposes a greater general culture than all other kinds of literature: it needs, in order to prosper, a public with an unusual fineness of taste, catholicity of interests, and breadth and versatility of mind. Hence, it has never been a popular branch of letters. It has flourished only in circles of curious, polished, and well-informed readers: in the circle of Dr. Johnson, in the circle of Hazlitt, and in the circle of Sainte-Beuve. Happily, the circle of Hazlitt was larger than that of Dr. Johnson, and the circle of Sainte-Beuve larger still than that of Hazlitt; and this progress in popularity has been accompanied by a progress in the art itself.

In the matter of invention Hazlitt equalled Dr. Johnson. The "Contemporary Portraits" were as authentic in design and as original in execution as the "Lives of the Poets." Dr. Johnson was a critic who had practised as a novelist: Hazlitt was a critic who had practised as a painter. Their points of view were, therefore, entirely different. Hazlitt was not concerned with character in its growth, but with character in its flower. He regarded the personality of an author, in the fashion of a painter, as a fixed thing to be set forth in as vivid and brilliant a manner as possible. The Velasquez of literary critics, he depicted excellently that which he really saw. In the art of appreciation he may not have been pre-eminent: Coleridge's depth of insight and Lamb's exquisiteness of taste were, perhaps, as remarkable as Hazlitt's gusto, range and directness of vision: but in the art of character-writing in the manner of the seventeenth century, he was incomparable. His picture of "The Spirit of the Age" is a masterpiece. He seems to have been interested more in the cast of mind of his contemporaries than in the form of their ideas, and to have interpreted their works in the light of his study of their temperaments. The result is that his sketches have the glow, the colour and the movement of life. Affecting neither aloofness nor impartiality, he carries his readers with him into the arena, and inspires them with somewhat of the interest and the passion with which he mingled in the conflict of the personal forces of his period.

One reader he inspired with an enthusiasm equal to his own. When the "Contemporary Portraits" became known in France, the future author of "Portraits Contemporains" was a critic of the academic French school of the eighteenth century. Though Sainte-Beuve was well versed in English letters, he had failed to see the importance of the revolution effected by Dr. Johnson in the method of criticism, and it was not until Villemain applied the new method to the study of French literature that he recognised its great value. But, just when he appeared to have lost in the field of criticism the position of innovator which his comrades were acquiring in the field of lyrical and dramatic poetry, he found in the work of Hazlitt the example of an art more novel and attractive than that which Villemain had introduced. "The Spirit of the Age," with its bold and incisive delineation of the characters of living authors, its romantic and liberal point of view, and its impassioned discussion of the problems of the day, was to him a source of enlightenment and an object of emulation:

There is another sort of criticism [he exclaimed with the joy of a discoverer] more alert and more engaged in the tumult of the hour and in its living issues: in this the critic, armed like a light horseman, rides in the van of the battle and there directs the movements of the spirits of his age.

Then, to show clearly from whom he derived his inspiration, Sainte-Beuve published under the name of Hazlitt some verses on the new school of criticism. His "Sonnet by Hazlitt" is of no great literary merit, but it is, perhaps, worth citing, as it certainly expresses something of the spirit of the English essayist:

Oh, ne me blamez pas de ma critique active !
Tout lendemain d'article emporté vaillamment
A pour moi son réveil matinal et charmant,
Tant la pensée afflue et tant l'image arrive !

Au clairon de la veille, à ce pressant qui vive,
Maint beau rêve lointain, et sans cela dormant,
S'arme, accourt, mais trop tard, et voit l'endroit fumant,
Et se met avec l'aube à chanter sur la rive.

Après les lents écrits, après les longs combats,
A-t-on si fol essor, si joyeuses recrues,
Tant d'oiseaux babillards panachés en soldats ?

Le steam-boat a passé : les vagues accrues
Se dressant comme au bruit de flottes apparues, S'ébattent à grand 'aise et rêvent d' Armadas.

Some serious men of letters [Sainte-Beuve continued with a glance at Villemain] are inclined to slight this sort of writing; still, a gallery of contemporary portraits may present a lively idea of the spirit of a period. In the case of writers of past ages, it is not easy to trace the connection between their books and their personality and circumstances. On the other hand, in the case of living authors, however incomplete and changeable their work may be, and in however constrained a manner a critic may have to write of them, yet, when he has found the key to their talent or genius, he can make his discovery known without proclaiming it from the house-tops.

The last sentence is characteristic of Sainte-Beuve. There is something feminine in his curious mixture of timidity and subtlety, as there is something masculine in Hazlitt's vehemence and outspokenness. The two critics had, however, much in common with each other. They were sentimental epicureans with a strain of morbid feeling which found expression in a similar manner in the "Liber Amoris" and the "Livre d'Amour"—Sainte-Beuve was fond of Hazlitt's titles!—; and probably they both saved themselves from the fate of Amiel by giving an outward direction to their restless faculty of introspection, and transforming it into an unusual power of insight into the souls of their contemporaries. Hazlitt had the stronger character, Sainte-Beuve the more impressionable nature. The French writer's interests in life were narrower than those of the English essayist, but his sympathies were more profound. Insensible to the influence of abstract ideas but keenly susceptible to the force of personality, he was dominated in turn by every leader of thought of his age. As his attachments were matters of sentiment rather than matters of reason, when the attachments were broken something of the sentiment remained to intimidate and weaken his judgment. Hence his "Portraits Contemporains" compare unfavourably with the "Contemporary Portraits" of Hazlitt. The disciple lacked his master's clarity of vision and his sureness and vivacity of touch. He did not then know his own mind well enough to understand fully the minds of the men who had subdued and misled him. Having failed to find in Hugo, Chateaubriand, Lamennais and the Saint-Simonians the strength and inspiration he needed, he was so vexed with them that he wished to indicate the element of unsoundness in their genius; but he was unable to do so as he had no settled ground of criticism. He still wavered between surrendering himself to his sense of the sweetness and beauty of religion, and cultivating his growing interest in life as a spectacle as meaningless as it was entertaining. He was a sentimental sceptic in the making, the forerunner of Renan, but he had not succeeded in transforming his natural indecision and voluptuousness of character into an instrument of exquisite epicureanism. This, however, he at last did in his work on the greatest of his contemporaries, Chateaubriand. He was then forty-five years of age.

His genius, slower in growth than that of Hazlitt, produced, when it arrived at maturity, fruit of a stranger and more penetrating savour. His weaknesses gradually became a source of strength; his timidity was refined into subtlety; his vacillation into the hesitancy of a taste of extraordinary delicacy; his aversion from plain-speaking into a sort of Attic reticence in expression. Above all, the erratic adventures of his own frail and vagrant soul in a world of personal forces endued him with a singular versatility of sympathy and an uncommon power of insight, which enabled him to enter into the souls of all kinds of men and to study them dispassionately and yet intimately as examples of the frames of mind through which he had passed on his way to a profound and ultimate state of scepticism. In his hands, criticism became the art of living an infinity of lives and of living them, at times, more deeply, more intensely and more clearly than the persons who actually had lived them. In matters of taste he never displayed, in regard to the sublime things in literature, the gusto of Hazlitt; in matters of feeling he never exhibited, in regard to the heroic things in life, the fiery passion of Carlyle; nevertheless, in the matter of portraiture Hazlitt, in comparison with him at his best, seems to be a painter of surfaces, and Carlyle a sculptor of figures of fantasy. Sainte-Beuve was, in fact, an incomparable student of the varieties of the human mind. Partly English in his origin and culture, but wholly French in the diverseness and undulancy of his nature, he infused into the form of art invented by Dr. Johnson something of the charm and the spirit of Montaigne.

FICTION

A Sovereign Remedy. By FLORA ANNIE STEEL. (Heinemann, 6s.)

WE have sometimes thought in reading Mrs. Steel's Indian stories that they owed much, if not everything, to their Indian background. The author was able to throw the glamour of India like a golden veil over men and women who, if seen without the veil, would have lacked life. In this novel Mrs. Steel has bravely thrown away the veil and given us what is in her without the aid of Eastern magic. The surroundings are British, the characters are British and the moral is that Britons are in a bad way. Mrs. Steel has the most positive opinions about matters that other minds see from various sides and find puzzling. We will not say that the opinions are held consistently or even are consistent with each other; but consistency is a virtue requiring qualities of judgment and deliberation that are apt to put out the generous fire of enthusiasm. At any rate, Mrs. Steel is not in agreement with Pippa, who, after touching tragedy at various points, decided that all was right with the world. Mrs. Steel says that there are three nations in this country, the idle rich, the philanthropic rich and the poor; and that the people who do the most harm are the philanthropic rich. When Lord Blackborough is introduced to us he is the richest peer in England; when we part from him he is ruined. We knew from the beginning that he would be, and it made us uncomfortable, because we think that heroes who squander their money for no good reason are more silly than heroic. But in this story all the sordid, material people either have money or get it; and all the noble, spiritual people either have none or throw it away as soon as they can. The best thing in the book is the distinction between Ned and Ted: the little touches that show you one man made of fine clay, the other of coarse; one man so indifferent to money that his folly in losing it provokes you: the other man so set on money that his whole outlook is vulgarised, his moral standard gradually lowered. The incredible thing is that a girl like Aura should have been happy in his neighbourhood. We believe that Mrs. Steel is trying to express a high spiritual idea in Aura's love-story, and we want to follow and understand her as well as we can. But we find now, as we have often found before in her novels, that she is content to leave her people and their motives half-explained, nebulous. The result is that we have no faith in Aura just when we want faith most. We can believe that an innocent unworldly girl might refuse at first to marry the man she loved because she was afraid of putting her love to the test of marriage. But the whole episode is too fine for us. We can just succeed in following Aura to the point where she refuses to marry Ned and we hope, as he did, that she will have changed her mind when he comes back in two months. It staggers us when she goes straight home from her interview with him and agrees quite cheerfully to marry Ted. Later in the story Ned visits her and finds that she actually is happy with Ted in a hideous semi-detached villa, cooking his dinner and wearing pink satin and pearls when Mr. Hirsch and Miss Hirsch dine with them. Ned, who has been trying in vain to forget her at the other end of the world, is shocked; and so are we. "The electric blue paper covered with gigantic poppies of a deeper hue" jars on us, as do all her surroundings. If fate had driven her there we would have applauded her for making the best of fate; but we never met a young woman who chose the lowest with more inexplicable determination: inexplicable, because Aura is a charming figure, innocent and beautiful. So her history becomes a baffling medley of the real and the ideal, and in spite of her charm she remains one of Mrs. Steel's enigmas. There are many other people in the book: the Jewish financier, Mr. Hirsch, is a character we often meet in fiction nowadays, but this one is likeable. He must have lived a long while in England however, for he seems to have forgotten his German.

A Rogue's Tragedy. By BERNARD CAPES. (Methuen, 6s.)

THERE is no one like Mr. Capes for rogues; no one like him for showing us depths of roguery contrasted sharply against the whitest of innocence. The difficulty in his new novel is to determine which was the rogue, whose tragedy gives the title. For there are many rogues in this story of old Savoy, and they all have tragedies: the aged, hideous libertine, the Marquis di San Rocco, who married the white lily of Savoy on the understanding that for a year he should not be her husband in more than name, and then met his death in attempting to break that understanding; there is his natural son, Gaston, or Cartouche, or Mr. Trix, the macaroni, the dandy of iron will and a great capacity for affairs, who loved the white lily all his life and died to save her; there is Dr. Bonito, ex-physician to the Marquis and a prominent member of the Society of the Illuminati, who blackmailed the white lily and was killed by Cartouche for his pains. There is Monsieur de France, the lily's father, a truer villain in his meanness and pride than any; finally there is Louis-Marie de Saint-Péray, the lily's second husband, who murdered her first. He, however, was not so much villain as fool. Pious, hesitating, over-sensitive, he allows the lily to shoulder the whole burden of his life—murder and all—and bear it till in their middle age the French Revolution brings both to the guillotine, and the lily, as she thinks, to Hell for her husband's sin. And then, there is the lily herself. Now, some novelists have a gift of pitching you head foremost into love with the heroine at first meeting—and that without a word of description. Mr. Capes is not one of these. We are never in love with Yolande of the white hands; we can but take it for granted—without sympathy—that she was as lovely and desirable as the Marquis, Mr. Trix, Louis-Marie, and others all found her. And the more we hear of her, the less we love her. We come, in fact, almost to dislike her, and for a simple reason. It is conceivable that the Latin races are able to discuss purity without feeling it soiled thereby: the English are not. Nine readers out of ten will feel that in so persistently dwelling on the purity, the maidenhood, of his heroine, in making it the point of his story and preserving no reticence on the subject, Mr. Capes has rubbed all the bloom off her freshness, has staled the very whiteness with which he intended to dazzle us. That gives a mawkish flavour to a book that is strong, with the elaborate strength of Mr. Capes, full of thought, of incident, of contrast, of sharp characterisation and vigorous narrative. We read, spell-bound, fascinated; we shudder as we lay down the book, feeling that nothing is so horrible as a clumsy hand.

Our Lady of the Pillar. By EÇA DE QUEIROZ. Done into English by EDGAR PRESTAGE. (Constable, 2s. 6d. net.)
The Sweet Miracle. By EÇA DE QUEIROZ. Done into English by EDGAR PRESTAGE. (Moser.)

THE works of the Portuguese novelist, Eça de Queiroz, of whom we have two little translations by Mr. Edgar Prestage before us, should be translated entire by the same hand and published for the delectation of English readers. Queiroz was the founder of the modern realist school in Portugal, and, being born in 1843, he accomplished in the lifetime that closed in 1900 a great work. "Cousin Basil," "The Correspondence of Fradique Mendes," "The Relic" and other books, show the extraordinary versatility of the man, the breadth of his sympathies, the exactness of his observation, his humour, the richness of his mind, his unique vividness of presentation. In the original his management of language recalls that of Flaubert, and we may say at once that Mr. Prestage has done very well in his translations. We have here not a little of the music of the original, the inevitable aptness and vividness of the words, the rigid rejection of the unfitting, and the harmony of style that breathes through the whole of each of these short stories. "Our Lady of the Pillar" is a work that one cannot forget. In tone, sentiment, subject, it is mediæval.

It tells of a young Spanish knight and his love for a young Spanish lady married to a jealous old noble: of the horrible trap by which the lover, who had no idea of pressing his suit, was lured into visiting the old noble's country castle, and of the strange means by which the Virgin of the Pillar saved him from being foully murdered. It is a weird, an enthralling story, of gibbets by lonely roadsides, of creaking chains, of a dead felon who came to life, and returned, when his mission was done, to his gibbet. Passionate love and hideous jealousy and lofty honour are in every line; there is deep mystery and thrilling horror; and over all the blaze of the Spanish sun or the glowing depths of the Spanish night. But what makes the story especially remarkable is the manner of its telling; the extraordinary closeness and vividness of imagination, the sharpness of effect, the severe economy of words with which the desired impression is irresistibly conveyed. It shows workmanship of the highest order. So, in its very different way, does "The Sweet Miracle" (Suave Milagre). This is a little fantasy of the Holy Land in the days of our Lord. A rich man of Samaria sends his servants to seek Him, that He may remove the misfortunes that have befallen his estates: they cannot find Him. A Roman centurion sends his soldiers to seek Him, that He may cure his only daughter; they cannot find Him. A crippled boy, who has lain starving and groaning on the rags of a rotting mattress in a hovel wishes that He might come to cure him, and with a smile, He appears in the doorway. Once more the particular effect is gained by severe economy of means: it is perfect—a minute jewel, but flawless and of the first water and cut by a master hand.

The Wickhamses. By W. PETT RIDGE. (Methuen, 6s.)

THE work of Mr. Pett Ridge commands attention and quite deservedly so: for, though it lacks distinction of thought and of expression, it is downright and amiable and sincere. He has the knack (and it is no inconsiderable one) of fitting friends as old as Dickens with fresh garments, so that the old friends appear amazingly well in their new guise. He makes no attempt to be modern, and herein precisely lies his quality and his limitation. There is something about his work that is strangely reminiscent of a German room, neatly arranged and very clean, with its warmth and comfort and the agreeable sweet smell of some old herb coming from the great stove in the corner: and yet stay in that room too long and open goes the large window to its full extent, however biting the wind may be outside. Though the herb is at first fragrant, and the warmth and neatness are at first pleasant and home-like, the room suddenly and soon is apt to become stuffy and unbearable: its comfort is deceptive and so unduly exaggerates pique at its natural consequence. Mr. Pett Ridge never keeps you too long in his room. The visit is timed to a nicety and its effect is, therefore, all that is agreeable. "The Wickhamses" is no exception and is perfectly typical of his manner and mind in its old-fashioned fragrance of sentiment, its closeness and its extreme neatness of construction. The family come up to London from the country—their arrival in Islington in the first chapter is a capital opening—and Mr. Wickhams settles down to his work as a printer with Joseph his son, Mary, Sarah and Ruth, his three daughters. The children's wits are sharpened by the air of London and they strike out lines of their own, leaving their father, who is an old tyrant, yet lovable for all his tyranny. Mary marries very well: Sarah becomes an illustrator and journalist: Jo makes his way in the City and Ruth teaches. In a word, the family breaks up, and Mr. Wickhams, who is too old to adapt himself to London, fails. Each member of the family is too interested in his or her own pursuits to care much for him or his future or each other, until they all meet at little Ruth's funeral in the country—she was the youngest and the gentlest—and then they make a compact to stand by each other in the future and not to forget the compact until they have forgotten her. The best thing in the book (and that alone would make the book well worth reading) is Jo's initiation as office-boy in the business house. Mr. Pett Ridge can describe a phase of life with extraordinary skill: the picture is vivid and convincing: if he possessed the same skill in presenting his persons as he does in presenting his actual background, his work would be of a very high order indeed. But he does not. His characters are no more than agreeable shadows, and his work accordingly—good honest work though it undoubtedly is and full of charm—just misses excellence.

A Pixy in Petticoats. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

IF "A Pixy in Petticoats" be a first essay in fiction, the author—or authors, for here and there we fancy we detected traces of a woman's hand—shows considerable promise. That we found the opening chapters dull and both Burrough and Beatrice a little unconvincing at first, is a tribute rather than a reproach: the authors of the book have studied the varied elements which make up the sum of life, and they know that the gold seldom overshadows the drab. Once launched on the story, our interest never flags: little by little, by subtle revelations of character, we come to understand the "pixy in petticoats" and the man who is slowly winning his way back to health in the solitudes of Dartmoor, and our doubts clear. They are not the conventional hero and heroine: faultless, impossible. That is why they become convincing. We are shown their deficiencies—very real deficiencies they are—and as our understanding increases, we grow to love the wayward Beatrice whom the moor and the winds and the pixies call from the habitations of man, and to love also, in lesser degree, the lonely Burrough in his cottage at the edge of the gorge. They are living, breathing creatures, and we follow them in their mad escapades; enter into their swaling excursion and their adventures in the storm that breaks upon them on their way back from Cranmere; sit in the ruins of Tom-tit-tot's Palace and listen to Beatrice telling her Cornish folk-tale—the story of the famous Tregeagle; and gradually the spirit of the moors enters into our veins, and we live their lives. But we know that Beatrice is not for Burrough: is not, indeed, for any man: we know that she is wedded to the moor and the winds and the flowers and the pixies, and when the bogs of Cranmere claim their toll, we turn the last page with a feeling of thankfulness that the author has triumphed over an obvious temptation. With a little more power, and here and there a little more restraint, "A Pixy in Petticoats" might have been a great book. Dickens would have gloried in the characters Anne and Willum Cobbledick—but he would probably have spouted them by exaggeration.

FINE ART

PAINT AND PERSONALITY

OR the general belief that painters can be made though poets must be born, ample evidence is afforded by the innumerable art-schools in all civilised countries. The common habit of regarding pictures as imitations rather than creations, as representations rather than presentations, has betrayed us into attaching too great an importance to the painter's manual dexterity, too little to his mental qualities. Criticism of recent years has devoted itself so exclusively to the analysis of the painter's handiwork that we are in danger of losing sight of that "fundamental brain-work" which is, as Rossetti said, the ground foundation of every work of art; and in debating on the relative importance of subject and treatment our critics are apt to forget the supreme importance of the painter's personality.

Just as in the eighteenth century the student was taught that excellence in painting might be attained by imitating the performances of the old masters, so to-day art-students all the world over are being exhorted to copy nature as the best means to artistic grace, and few have the wit to perceive or the courage to declare that art proceedeth from within and not from without, that fidelity to nature is unavailing without a personal appreciation of the pictorial beauties in a landscape. That beauty resides more in the seeing eye than in the object seen is now admitted to be a truism, but the belief is still prevalent that artistic mastery springs more from the painter's hand than his brain.

To combat this fashionable fallacy is the principal object of an article recently contributed by M. Maurice Denis to the Parisian review, L'Ermitage, an article so sound in theory and apt in expression that we make no apology for the following quotation:

Parce que trop de critiques autrefois la confondaient avec la littérature et ne jugeaient dans un tableau que les intentions du sujet écrit, ou le plus ou moins de ressemblance entre l'objet peint et l'objet représenté, on c'est insurgé avec quelle raison! contre la peinture littéraire, contre la niaiserie naturaliste. Il s'en faut qu'il faille cependant exalter uniquement les qualités matérielles de l'œuvre d'art et mépriser les qualités de l'homme qui s'en sert pour s'exprimer. L'artiste est à lui-même son véritable sujet. Restreindre l'art à traduire une sensation d'un moment, c'est sous couleur de sincérité, une forme d'abdication de soi, aussi fâcheuse que celle qui consiste à raconter froidement une anecdote ou à paraphraser un sujet littéraire. Mais ne chercher dans la peinture, comme on tend à le faire de plus en plus, que le plaisir sensuel des yeux, ne la vouloir que décorative, c'est ignorer la part que prend l'âme humaine aux satisfactions esthétiques, c'est faire de la psychologie de primaire, c'est soumettre une des plus complexes opérations de l'esprit à d'inexactes catégories. Qu'importe dans une œuvre d'art la vérité ou la fantaisie, le sujet littéraire ou l'absence de sujet? Il n'y a pas de peinture vivante une émotion d'homme? Il y a trop de peintures qui n'ont pas d'âme. A force de se vouloir personnels, originaux, libérés de toute influence, les jeunes artistes en sont arrivés à s'enorgueillir des moindres singularités de leur technique improvisée. Leur ambition est de n'être que peintres et de ne devoir leur supériorité qu'aux tours de force de peinture qu'ils croient avoir réussi. C'est ce que M. Remy de Gourmont appelle la superstition du talent. . . . Il ne suffit pas de vouloir n'être que peintre pour l'être supérieurement. L'exemple d'un Cézanne ou d'un Vuillard n'infirme pas notre opinion. Car s'il est vrai qu'il ne tirent que des ressources mêmes de leur art les moyens par quoi ils nous émeuvent, il faut noter quel est l'apport de leur sensibilité: avec quelle passion ils s'efforcent de chercher aux spectacles de la nature des équivalents exquis ou somptueux; avec quels scrupules ils s'attachent à ne rendre de la nature que l'admirable reflet qu'ils en trouvent en eux-mêmes.

The warnings sounded by this French critic are more than ever needed during the present reign of the virtuoso. Our Royal Academy exhibitions prove that there are too many "soulless pictures" in England as well as in France, and in painting, as in music, the tendency of the day is to rate execution above expression. Yet we need go no further than the Tate Gallery to learn by comparing Rossetti's Annunciation with Mr. Hacker's treatment of the same subject which of these two is the more important. Technically Mr. Hacker is far better equipped than Rossetti was at the time he made this picture, his drawing of the figure is far more correct, his knowledge of perspective is doubtless more profound; yet with all his dexterity he fails to give the one thing Rossetti secures with his scantier technical ability, that living, human emotion without which, as M. Denis observes, all pictures are profitless.

L'artiste est à lui-même son véritable sujet. It is the painter who makes the picture, not his model, nor his master, though these, we willingly concede, may give him some assistance. If a painter have no poetry in himself, there will be no poetry in his painting. If he be a commonplace man, his pictures will be commonplace, for all his knowledge of drawing, perspective and chiaroscuro. On the other hand, if a man be possessed of an artistic temperament, his paintings, howsoever faulty they may be in technique, will assuredly be neither uninteresting nor commonplace. Whatsoever there be in a man will come out in his picture, whether he be a trained draughtsman or no. "Whatever of dignity," said Leighton, "whatever of strength we have within us will dignify and make strong the labour of our hands; whatever littleness degrades our spirit will lessen and drag them down.

Whatever noble fire is in our hearts will burn also in our work, whatever purity is ours will chasten and exalt it." Can we not read in the over-polished surfaces of Leighton's own works that excess of courtliness which sapped his strength?

No amount of training will make the student a great painter unless the artist soul be his already, and his first step towards becoming a great painter must be the cultivation and development of his own personality. And if training cannot save him, neither can truth. Mere attention to accuracy has never yet made a great artist. As Watts, arguing himself into a corner, was forced to concede that the subject of a painting was less important than the treatment, the "character of utterance," so one of the simplest and deepest of Nature-lovers, Jules Dupré, was bound to admit: "Nature is only a pretext; art, passing through the individual, is the goal. Why," he asked, "does one speak of a Vandyck, a Rembrandt, without saying what the picture represents? It is because the subject should disappear, so that the individual only, the creator, may exist. Another example: one says, 'stupid as a cabbage.' But who dares to say 'stupid as a cabbage painted by Chardin?' It is that the human being has passed into it."

Let the painter go to nature by all means, but let him not come back seeking our praise solely because he has truthfully copied what he saw. If accuracy were all, then would painting be a science and not an art; but because the subjective qualities in a painting outweigh its objective truth we demand of the artist that he should return, not with a topographical inventory, but with the reflection of an aspect of nature transfigured in his own soul.

THE SEASON AT CHRISTIE'S

IF devoid of sensational transactions, the past season at Christie's has not been without features of interest. Generally speaking, it has been a better year for buyers than sellers; for, whereas the works of a few painters—notably Sam Bough, P. Nasmyth and Fantin-Latour—have shown an increase in market value, those of a far greater number have shown a remarkable decrease. The reaction against Royal Academy pictures of an anecdotal and historical order has resulted in the severe depreciation of works not only by Messrs. Frith, Goodall, Egg and Marcus Stone, but practically all early Victorian paintings, including the works of Etty, Stothard, W. Muller and John Phillip. The sterling qualities, especially of colour, in the paintings of these four artists render it extremely probable that the depreciation of their work is only temporary. Consequently, it may be held that buyers have this year had the opportunity to secure good examples of these artists at low prices, while similar opportunities have been presented by the appearance in the sale-room of early works by New English and other non-Academic painters whose productions are likely to be more highly valued in the future.

That prices have been uniformly low is sufficiently indicated by the fact that only twenty-seven pictures this year exceeded 1400 guineas, as against 43 in 1905, 37 in 1904 and 38 in 1903. No work reached five figures, the highest sum given for a single painting this year being 6400 guineas for a late Turner, The Rape of Europa. Early English portraits by recognised masters continue in favour, but in the absence this year of any outstanding examples of Raeburn, Gainsborough and Reynolds prior place as regards price has been taken by Romney's Mrs. Mingay (6200 guineas), and Hoppner's Lady Waldegrave (6000 guineas). The last was bought by the late Mr. Woods for £23. Of the continental old masters few important examples have been seen. A doubtful Botticelli, The Virgin, sold for 5000 guineas, a more probable Titian, Lorenzo di Medici, was bought by Mr. Hugh P. Lans for 2100 guineas, while an Extensive View over a Landscape by P. de Koninck realised 2100 guineas, the highest sum yet given at auction for an example of this master.

New records have also been made by Sam Bough's Loch Achray (£1029), and Cosway's drawing, The Fair Step-mother and Ladies of the Loftus Family (1150 guineas). Downman drawings, which have enormously increased in value during the last twenty years, again advanced in price, three averaging £300, while a fourth broke all records at 820 guineas. Thirty years ago they could have been bought for a less number of shillings.

At Sotheby's Rembrandt's famous etching, The Three Trees, advanced from £355 to £385, McArdell's mezzotint after Reynolds's portrait of Mary Duchess of Ancaster reached a maximum at £450, Burke's Lady Rushout and Child, in brown, after Angelica Kauffman, rose from £70 to £130, and several Whistler etchings, notably The Palaces, showed a slight increase in value.

We may conclude this brief review of the season's art sales with the mention of two notable prices given at Christie's for miniatures, £624 for Isaac Oliver's Henry Prince of Wales eldest son of James I., and £1155 for two portraits by Nicholas Hilliard of himself and his father.

MUSIC

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS—I

ONCE more, while all who can are flying away from her, London is cheering her captives with the nightly Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall. At the first of these on Saturday night the whole floor of the hall was packed with a standing audience, and a sea of upturned, eager faces gazed with devout attention at Mr. Wood and his orchestra and offered incense at the shrine in a cloud of tobacco smoke. The first concert was even longer than usual and included all the prime favourites of the more dramatic or sensational kind, the prelude to Lohengrin, act iii., the overture to Tannhäuser, Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie No. 2, the "1812" overture and the Peer Gynt Suite, so that the hundreds who had waited to get places and who stood through three hours or more of music, could not be disappointed; they got all they came for and more besides. Yes, a good deal more, because some did not bargain for Mozart's concerto for flute and orchestra in G, and though to many this must have been a most refreshing and delightful treat, like a breath of fresh air after the stifling heat of Wagner's footlights, a little movement among the tired ones who were standing all the time, showed that its quietness had given them time to remember the weakness of the flesh.

It was altogether the revival of an old scene. There was nothing new in this beginning of a new season, unless it was that Mr. Wood seemed to hold both his orchestra and his audience still better in hand than formerly, that he inspired his men with new fervour in playing the old music, that his audience were good children and stood more still than they used to, and never once struck matches in pianissimo passages. This discipline of his audience is, by the way, one of the most remarkable features of Mr. Wood's work, and he has now acquired an autocracy which is only paralleled in completeness by that of the policeman who controls the traffic of a crowded thoroughfare. To one who has the privilege of a seat in the balcony, and who knows the music well enough to listen rather lazily, the audience soon becomes the absorbing interest, and I must confess to just this amount of laziness on Saturday, that it was the impression of the music on the mass of the audience below rather than on myself which held my attention. Those little movements and fluctuations, contrasted with the perfect stillness of the intensely interesting moments, seem to show the common attitude towards the music, illuminating the individual element of the people who have, or think they have taste and knowledge.

The old question crops up: What do people like and want?—the question, which, asked wrongly, has ruined the work of countless composers and retarded the advance of public taste to a lamentable extent. In spite of that, however, it has got to be asked and answered in some way by every one who puts his finger into the musical pie, whether as composer or interpreter, and it is probably because he has got nearer than any one to the answer to the question, that Mr. Wood is the strongest popular power in the musical life of London. At first sight the answer seems to be: Sensation and excitement with a good deal of noise; but that is only a very superficial one. It is true that a Queen's Hall audience, like any other crowd, is easily excited by a noise, and then wants to make a noise too, which takes the form of tumultuous applause at the end, but that has not much to do with what music appeals most, and it is quite easy to look a little deeper. Next, two things seem to make the most direct and genuine appeal: one of them musical, the other not so, namely a tune and a story. The audience themselves do not know it; on the contrary, they rather think that they give themselves up to be swayed by the deep emotions of Wagner and Tschaikovsky, but a very slight experience in the art of listening through the ears of the crowd will reveal the fact that tune and story are the ruling powers. They are not very particular or far seeing as to whether the tune is a good one or the story well told: one or other they must have, and, at best, both. The "1812" overture has not much except ingenuity to recommend it musically, but it is a stirring story well told, and, allowing something for the mere excitation of the noise, it is that that inspires enthusiasm. On the other hand, Sullivan's dreadfully silly song, "Thou art passing hence, my brother," tells its story very badly, both in words and music, but it is the story of life and death in which every one is interested, and all its faults are forgiven it. So much for the love of a story. The question whether it helps to a musical appreciation brings us back to the much debated controversy about programme music. Sometimes, as in the case of Sullivan's song, it kills musical judgment, but that it plays an important part in making people come to hear music no one who frequents Queen's Hall can deny.

But the love of tune is no less strong and is the starting-point of real musical appreciation. Most of Saturday's audience probably knew little enough about William Tell, except the apple-shooting story, and if they had known more they would have found some difficulty in hearing his story in Rossini's overture, but they were, as usual, delighted by the tunes; and in the case of the Tannhäuser overture, where a story is told by means of several contrasted tunes, good long ones, not irritating scraps of leit motif, the delight rose higher still, and that is probably the most popular work in the repertoire of the Queen's Hall orchestra.

New works are going to be performed at the Promenade Concerts. To his great powers as an interpreter Mr. Wood adds the virtue of unbounded resource, and he leaves no type of orchestral music untouched; but these new things generally fall rather flat and are rarely given a second time. It may be different this year, but on the whole that has been so in the past. Yet they have been clever works, full of emotion and local colour and all the things that critics praise and modern audiences are expected to admire. Why do not composers write tunes, long tunes that give people time to learn them, tunes that go on getting better and aspiring higher? They are what the patient, standing audience at Queen's Hall really wants and craves for, though it does not always know it, and they, by meeting people on their own ground, could do more than by any other means to help to develop musical taste. What such forms of composition would do for the composers themselves I dare not suggest, but the possibilities for the development of new melodic rhythms seems almost endless and at present almost unexplored. The audience, however, can enjoy tunes and stories.

Give them a story by all means if it helps them to listen, and the composer to write; but he is a musician, and tunes are his point of contact with his hearers, so he needs must write tunes.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER have in the press a new edition, in eight volumes, of the works of Mrs. Gaskell. "The Knutsford Edition" will be edited, with introductions, by Dr. A. W. Ward, Master of Peterhouse, and each volume is to contain a frontispiece in photogravure. The works, which will be issued at fortnightly intervals, beginning on September 3 next, will be arranged as far as possible in chronological order, and will include several hitherto unreprinted contributions to periodicals, together with two new poems, and some unpublished fragments of stories. It may be interesting to recall George Sand's verdict on Mrs. Gaskell: "Mrs. Gaskell," she said, "has done what neither I nor other female writers in France can accomplish. She has written novels which excite the deepest interest in men of the world, and yet which every girl will be the better for reading."

Professor Maitland's biography of Sir Leslie Stephen will be published by Messrs. Duckworth early in the autumn.

"The Best Plays of George Farquhar," edited, with an introduction, by Mr. William Archer, are about to be added to Mr. Unwin's Mermaid Series. The plays reprinted are: The Constant Couple, The Recruiting Officer, The Beaux' Stratagem, and The Twin Rivals. Mr. Archer's is the first edition in which the various readings of the early quartos have been noted. The volume will be ready on August 27. Mr. Unwin will publish on the same date a volume by Mr. S. Parnell Kerr entitled "From Charing Cross to Delhi." The book is not a guide-book or an elaborate treatise on Indian problems, but a light, humorous and irresponsible chronicle of impressions received during a visit to India, with certain grave matter in appendices for those who desire it. It is illustrated from photographs taken by the author.

Messrs. Methuen announce for publication next week, in their Antiquary's Library, a book on "The Bells of England," by Canon J. J. Raven. At the same time they will publish, in the Library of Devotion, "Death and Immortality," a little book of meditations written by the first Earl of Manchester early in the seventeenth century.

Mrs. George Bernard Shaw's translation of Brieux's Maternité, performed before the Stage Society in the spring of this year, is to be issued, together with Mr. St. John Hankin's translation of Les trois filles de M. Dupont and a hitherto unacted translation of Les Avariés by Mr. John Pollock, in the autumn. Mr. Bernard Shaw is at work on a preface to the volume, in which he will deal with the whole of the dramatic work of M. Brieux.

Messrs. Longmans have several important biographies in the press. Dr. Edgar Sheppard is editing a Memoir of the Private Life of the late Duke of Cambridge which will appear in two volumes, and "Letters Personal and Literary of Robert Earl of Lytton" will appear in the same form. Mr. J. Stuart Reid's "Life and Letters of the first Earl of Durham" is announced for early publication. Another book of interest promised by the same publishers is "The Correspondence of Two Brothers": the eleventh Duke of Somerset and Lord Webb Seymour.

Messrs. Methuen will publish early in September Mr. Robert Hichens's new novel, "The Call of the Blood." It is a story of Sicilian life, although the scene of the first two chapters is laid in London. The three principal characters are an Englishwoman, a Frenchman, and a man of mixed blood, English and Sicilian. Almost the whole of the story passes in or near a lonely cottage on a mountain not far from Etna, between Messina and Catania. The subsidiary characters are Sicilians, one of whom, a peasant boy, is brought into intimate relation with the three already mentioned, and plays an important part in the development of the plot, which is concerned with the strange domination sometimes exercised over a man by a strain of foreign blood inherited from an ancestor.

Messrs. Smith, Elder will publish early next month, a new novel by "Q"—"Sir John Constantine," an eighteenth-century story of a romantic adventure undertaken by a chivalrous Englishman to secure the crown of Corsica for his son, and to rescue a royal lady from duance. This involves the adventurers in the fierce strife of Corsican parties and Genoese invaders.

Messrs. Jack will issue in October "The Child's Life of Jesus," by the Rev. C. M. Steedman, uniform with their beautifully illustrated editions of "Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare" and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." In a new "Shown to the Children" series—similar in design to the "Told to the Children" series—they will publish three books on Birds, Beasts, and Flowers.

Mr. Nutt will publish this autumn a new volume of verse by Mr. Kaufmann Spiers, entitled "Durante and Selvaggia and other poems"—a companion book to "Guido and Veronica."

The third volume of "The Arts in Early England," the work on which Professor Baldwin Brown, the occupant of the Watson Fine Art Chair in Edinburgh University, has been engaged for some time past, will be issued shortly. The new volume deals with the decorative arts of the Anglo-Saxon period.

"From Carpathian to Pindus: Pictures of Roumanian Country Life," by Tereza Stratilesco, will be published by Mr. Unwin shortly. Roumanian country life is dealt with under various aspects: history, religion, economics and social and political life; and the ideas and customs of the peasantry are illustrated by specimens of their folk-lore songs. These are given both in the original and in the English translation, and airs are also appended. Two other travel books promised by the same publisher are: "Romantic Cities of Provence," by Mona Caird, illustrated with sketches by Joseph Pennell and Edward M. Synge, and "Uganda to Khartoum: Life and Adventure on the Upper Nile," by Albert B. Lloyd.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash has in the press and will publish early next month "A Twice-Crowned Queen, Anne of Brittany," by Constance, Countess De La Warr. About the same date he promises "The Red Burgee," a new novel by Mr. Morley Roberts.

The second volume of the "Index to Book Prices Current" covering the second ten years' volumes, from 1897 to 1906, is nearly ready for issue. It will present a key and epitome to the last decade of the book sales on the same plan as the first volume, but will contain several additional features. The total number of entries will be greatly increased. To the anonyms and pseudonyms the real names of authors will be added. Sub-indexes of illustrators of books and of Americana are to be given, and editors' and translators' names will also be indexed.

Two volumes which Messrs. Skeffington are shortly to issue are "Pribbles and Prabbles, or Rambling Reflections on varied Topics," by the late Major-General Patrick Maxwell, LL.D.; and "My Experiences of the Island of Cyprus," by B. Stewart.

Mrs. St. Leger Harrison (Lucas Malet) has a new novel, "The Far Horizon," in the press. It is not a sequel to her last work, "Sir Richard Calmady," though several of the characters which figured there are re-introduced. It is almost a quarter of a century since Lucas Malet published her first novel, "Mrs. Lorimer, a Sketch in Black and White."

So great was the popularity of Sir Frederick Treves's account of his trip round the world, which Messrs. Cassell and Company published last year under the title of "The Other Side of the Lantern" that eight impressions were called for. With a view of bringing this work under the notice of a much larger section of the public, the publishers have arranged to issued a cheap edition on August 31.

A feature of the Bradford Meeting of the Library Association, September 3 to 7, 1906, will be the publication of a "Class List of Best Books published 1905-6." The work will comprise over two thousand entries of books classified according to the Deucey Decimal Classification, and will be published at one shilling net by the Library Supply Co., of 181 Queen Victoria Street, E.C.

The serial rights of Harry Vardon's book "The Complete Golfer" have been secured by The World of Golf, and the opening chapter appears in the issue of August 23. The original photographs will also be published.

CORRESPONDENCE

"LIKE" AS A CONJUNCTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Prof. Tyrrell's calling the use of "like" for "as" "a vulgar error," and the correct phrase "like I did" an "atrocious" (ACADEMY, August 18, p. 159, col. 1) illustrates anew the old complaint that classical scholars and many otherwise cultured men know nothing of the history of their own language. Had Prof. Tyrrell spared a little of his time for that, he would have known that "like" is just as good a conjunction as it is a preposition. The early forms were "like as" and "like to." Gradually the as and to dropt off, and the single "like" became both conjunction and preposition. The more frequent use of it as a preposition made some inattentive folk suppose that it couldn't be a conjunction. But if Prof. Tyrrell will turn to Sidney Walker's paper on the conjunctive use of "like" in vol. ii. of his Works, and to Dr. Henry Bradley's article on "like" in our Oxford Dictionary, he will find that Shakespeare and his helper in Pericles used "like" as a conjunction, and that a chain of authors of good repute link our age to theirs in this legitimate use of the word. Shelley and William Morris were among them. Away from books, I cannot give other names.

This is, I think, the fourth letter I have written to literary journals on this "like" point during the last thirty years; but vulgar errors are hard to uproot. I think Prof. Tyrrell owes us English students the atonement of attending Prof. Napier's lectures on Historical English Grammar.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

August 18.

[Professor Tyrrell writes: More than half of the vulgarisms now current in the speech of the uneducated are really archaisms. I am not surprised to hear that like was used as a conjunction three hundred years ago. It is news to me that Shelley and William Morris so used it, and I will take care to verify that statement when next I have access to the Oxford Dictionary. But even if this be so, the employment of like as a conjunction is now a vulgarism. The pleonastic for is to be found in the New Testament; but if Dr. Furnivall will venture to say (among strangers unacquainted with his position in literature) "I went to Brighton for to see if I should enjoy it like I did last year," let me assure him that every educated person among his hearers will class him with the illiterate and vulgar.

I do not think like was ever a preposition or any part of speech but an adjective, as in Milton's verse

That liker thy Narcissus are.

I repeat, the phrase "like I did" is an atrocity in modern speech, like "I came for to see," and many similar phrases which I cannot quote, being like Dr. Furnivall (not, like Dr. F. is) away from my books. Byron used lay as an intransitive verb instead of lie. Mr. Austin writes lay when he means laid. That does not justify the usage; neither would a lapse in grammar, if such there be, on the part of Shelley or Morris, "trammel up the consequence" for one who should now make a like slip.

ECCENTRICITIES OF PRONUNCIATION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Among eccentricities of pronunciation no one, so far as I have observed, has noticed that Tennyson has not only "révenue" and "réfinue" but "réponse":

Then did my response clearer fall:
No compound of this earthly ball
Is like another, all in all.

The Dictt. give "subsidence" wrongly: cp. "résidence"; the quantity of the s in resideo and subsido is not the same; but there was a subsideo as there was a resido.

"THE ANTIQUARY AND THE SEAL"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My friend Dr. Cox tells you that he does not agree with several of the strictures contained in my review of Mr. Harvey Bloom's book on English Seals, and thinks "in common with other critics, that the book will fill a niche in popular archæology."

I am glad to see that Dr. Cox separates me from those critics who are so ready to use that delectable phrase.

Those who read Dr. Cox's letter carelessly will gather that I assailed this book for its printer's errors. It is true that it is full of such, and I regret to learn that the writer's ill-health kept him from correcting his proofs. In such a case it would have been surely better to delay the issue. But some three lines only of my review deal with slips for which the printer can be held responsible.

The contention which I must needs maintain against Mr. Bloom's other critics is that one who describe seals should have some accurate knowledge of the costume, the armour and the heraldry which enter into every page of his book. And I am obstinate in my belief that such a writer should be able to transcribe and translate accurately the seal-inscriptions encountered by him. Assuredly it was not the printer who made Mr. Bloom translate "Radulpho sis pia tutrix" as "to thy Ralph teach piety."

At the same time I am ready to acknowledge that Mr. Bloom's book is well bound, clearly printed and pleasantly illustrated. I have the plodding habit of reading books before reviewing them. Otherwise I could hardly have kept back the phrase that this handsome book filled a niche in popular archæology.

OSWALD BARRON.

Bruges, August 22

AMANTIUM IRAE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me a word of explanation as to an editorial comment in your issue of August 18, on a remark in the preface of my Latin Grammar? You considered it as "hypercritical" to find fault with the presentation of Terence's line Amantium irae amoris integratio as a model of Classical Prose. Now our model of Classical Prose is Cicero, who does not admit the idiom in question. Therefore, in my opinion, a Grammar ought to say so, and not lead a learner to suppose the contrary. Cicero may have been "hypercritical," but that is quite another matter.

A. SLOMAN.

[We have pleasure in publishing Mr. Sloman's letter. Our objection was raised from the point of view of grammar as a whole, not from that of classical Latin. From the latter aspect he is, of course, perfectly right in protesting against the inclusion in grammars of the Terentian tag: and the protest is on a par with the general level of his admirable and scholarly work.—ED.]

THE ENGLISH TONGUE

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Professor Otto Jespersen's defence of "the use of the split infinitive in moderation, and where necessary for rhythm or emphasis," as in Burns's line:

Who dared to nobly stem tyrannic pride

—I quote from Mr. Mayhew's review of "Growth and Structure of the English Tongue"—seems to me a little weak. The line as it stands is incorrect.

Who nobly dared to stem tyrannic pride is indisputably better: it does away with the split infinitive and places the adverb in the right position for the sense.

"DIEU ET MON DROIT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I find the following statement in a treatise entitled Anglia Notitia, by Edw. Chamberlayne, Doctor of Laws (1637), ed. 16, p. 69:

"The Motto, Dieu et mon Droit, that is, God and my Right, was first given by Richard the First, to intimate, that the King of England holdeth his Empire not in Vassalage of any Mortal Man, but of God only; and afterwards taken up by Edward the Third, when he first claimed the Kingdom of France."

I wonder if any of the readers of the ACADEMY would be kind enough to tell me on what contemporary authority these two assertions of Dr. Chamberlayne are based. They appear again and again in books of reference. But no one ever deigns to prove them by any historical evidence.

A. L. MAYHEW.

A PROTEST AGAINST "OG"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am encouraged by correspondence which I see in THE ACADEMY to ask permission to protest in your columns against the distortion of sound and sense in the generally accepted pronunciation of Photog'raphy, Geog'raphy, et hoc genus omne. In no other language is this solecism found, the Continental pronunciation being Geo'graphie, Photo'graphie, etc. One bad result is that the mind does not readily grasp the real meaning and etymology of the words mispronounced in the really vulgar, illiterate manner mentioned above. Let us all do what in us lies to undermine "Og"!

TOWARDS JOY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

MONSIEUR,—J'ai lu avec beaucoup d'intérêt et de plaisir le bel article que, dans l'ACADEMY, vous avez bien voulu consacrer à mon dernier ouvrage. Merci millefois pour les délicats éloges que vous lui décernez. Votre philosophie diffère de la mienne. Certes, je connais les beaux travaux de M. Metchnikoff, mais je ne pense pas qu'on puisse tirer de la seule biologie la philosophie totale de la vie humaine, et toute profane que je suis en pareille matière, je n'ignore pas que le Docteur Grasset, de Montpellier, un savant et un Chrétien, a justement intitulé un livre: Les Limites de la Biologie. Cela, d'ailleurs, vous le savez sans doute mieux que moi. Quoi qu'il en soit, je ne veux pas, Monsieur, vous laisser douter de ma reconnaissance, et je vous prie de croire à mes sentiments les plus distingués.

LUCIE FÉLIX-FAURE GOYAU.

THE FUTURE LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I regret that, owing to an accident, I have only to-day seen R.S.Y.'s answer to my letter. I thank him heartily for it, and I trust that in view of the deep interest which the subject must possess for all literary students you will do me the kindness to insert my lengthy and belated reply.

I can assure R.S.Y. that I did not mistake his object, and that I, too, was thinking only of the "social fact" and not of "literary quality." I contend that as a social fact there is found in many of the master minds of literature since the beginning of the Christian era a confident and exultant strain in the presence and contemplation of the solemn fact of death which it is absolutely impossible to parallel from the pre-Christian literatures of the world.

How does my friendly critic meet this contention?

(1) Modern authors "could one and all be shown to contradict themselves?" Does he really mean to say that Milton, Bunyan, and Cowper contradicted themselves on this point? I venture to ask for a proof of this. Can he show that Schiller ever contradicted the passages which I quoted? He cannot have done so, for the simple reason that he was a whole-hearted and devoted pupil of Kant, and it is well known that Kant made the belief in immortality one of the corner-stones of his philosophy. Let me quote a few words out of the lengthy passage in the "Critique of Pure Reason": "God and a future life are two hypotheses which, according to the principles of pure reason, are inseparable from the obligation which this reason imposes upon us." I can find nothing like this in the realm of ancient philosophy. Indeed, Kant's moral teaching (as Ritschl has admirably shown) was coloured throughout by the unavowed influence of Christianity.

(2) I fail to see how Pascal's words which R.S.Y. quotes can be held to cancel the sublime confidence of the passage to which I referred; and if he thinks that the passage from Pindar rivals the closing lines from "Lycidas," or the magnificent passage in the Third Book of the "Paradise Lost," or the final scene of the "Pilgrim's Progress," I am constrained to say that I do not agree with him. As to Byron and Goethe, I quoted from them because they were avowed unbelievers, and therefore any concession to Christian sentiment on their part is doubly significant.

(3) But modern writers are inconsistent. Most certainly; we are all inconsistent; even Saint Paul can be shown to have been inconsistent. But I submit that there are two kinds of inconsistency, an inconsistency which is fatal and an inconsistency which is venial.

Let me add one more instance to those which I gave in my former letter. If there is one great man in European literature who united to the most unquestionable genius the consummate knowledge of a man of the world, it was the famous Duc de St. Simon. Can we imagine Herodotus, or Thucydides, or Cicero, or Livy, or Tacitus writing a score of passages on the subject of death and the life beyond the grave which might be quoted from his "Memoirs"? I trow not.

THE BOOKSHELF

The Tourmaline Expedition. By Major A. Gibbon Spilsbury. (Dent 5s. net.)—Some ten years ago the proverbial man in the street would have been quite prepared to argue the rights and wrongs of the Tourmaline expedition; but, as his memory is short, the affair has by now been forgotten, and Major Spilsbury's book appears as a welcome reminder. It is welcome because the author was the protagonist in one of the most extraordinary adventures of the nineteenth century; an adventure which reminds us more of Captain Cook than of any one else. The story, which Mr. Spilsbury tells in a very straightforward way, is of how he went to the Court of Morocco with a view to inducing the Sultan to sanction the working of a concession, which purported to grant, on behalf of the tribes of Sus—the mysterious land south of the Atlas Mountains—the sole right to trade in their country. This is the least interesting part of the narrative: the fun begins when the steam yacht Tourmaline is bought and sails with a cargo, chiefly of arms and ammunition, to trade with the Susi on behalf of the Globe Venture Syndicate, Ltd. The encounter with the Sultan's man-of-war Hassanie, the offer by the Sultan of fifteen hundred dollars for Major Spilsbury's head, and the failure of the expedition make a tale of great interest, after which as an anti-climax, there is the account of the trial on the charge of "riotously and routously assaulting the soldiers of the Sultan of Morocco." It was that trial which made the Tourmaline famous, and the account of the trial as told in these pages is indeed remarkable. There is one point prominent throughout the book, and certainly borne out by facts: namely, that our Consular authorities do not look after our interests as well as the Consuls of other nationalities attend to their duty. And the remark is not only applicable to Morocco. The book is rather poorly illustrated with photographs, and contains an appendix on "South-West Barbary as a field for Colonisation," by Mr. W. B. Stewart.

Tales from the Talmud. By E. R. Montague. (Blackwood, 6s.)—The Mishna, the first half of the Talmud or oral law of the Jews, was committed to writing by the Rabbi Jehudah in the year 190 A.D. Tradition tells us that the unwritten law was given to Moses on Mount Sinai, was taught by him to Joshua, and so passed down by word of mouth until the second century B.C. Of the Mishna alone there have been many translations, notably that of Surenhusius into Latin (1697-1703), that of Abraham Ruben into Spanish (1606), and of Rabe into German (1760). The Gemara, or second half of the Talmud, was completed at Jerusalem about 400 A.D.; a larger Gemara being produced at Babylon about a hundred years later. Mr. Montague does not aspire to the translation of this rambling and voluminous code. He gives his work the modest title Tales from the Talmud, but the book is more than this, if only by virtue of the admirable introduction with which he prefaces the stories. The latter are taken chiefly from the Talmud, though a few come from the Targums, the Pirke Rabbi Eliezer, and other works more or less contemporaneous with the Talmud. Mr. Montague sets down these legends in very much the same rambling fashion in which they are to be found in the original, including much of the quaint and homely wisdom of the ancient Rabbis. Nothing was too great for their consideration, nothing too little. "In every action, in every conceivable circumstance . . . for food, dress, habit, language, devotion, relaxation . . . it prescribes almost every word and almost every thought to be conceived," said Deutsch in the Quarterly Review, July 1873. From a deep and learned dissertation on criminal law we pass suddenly to an intricate and conflicting discussion as to whether it constitutes "work" for a man to use a wooden leg or wear a false tooth on the Sabbath. To blow out a candle on the Sabbath, from motives of economy, is a sin, coming under the heading of "work," but to blow it out for fear of an evil spirit or a robber is not a sin. As in many old legends, we come continually on cases where a man is saved from execution by his ability to answer a conundrum or give a satisfactory solution to some abstruse problem. Many of the tales are wonderfully beautiful in native wisdom.

It is no easy matter to produce a work on British Birds, which shall be of moderate price, and yet contain accurate and artistic illustrations of each species. Mrs. Grant Richards has now brought out the first part of a book entitled The Birds of the British Islands, by Charles Stonham, C.M.G., F.R.C.S., F.Z.S., in which the chief feature will be the photogravure illustrations by Mr. L. M. Medland. These pictures are extremely beautiful and true to life, while the fine gradations of tone so well reproduce the markings of the plumage that for purposes of identification they are hardly at all inferior to the finest coloured illustrations. The work will be complete in twenty parts, each costing 7s. 6d. net. Mr. Stonham supplies descriptions of the birds, their plumage, food, habits, etc., which are brief in scope, but extremely accurate and observant. Owing to the essential character of most of the information which he supplies, the effect of their comparatively brief accounts is often more vivid, and of greater assistance for purposes of identification, than very much longer descriptions in standard works. Particular stress is laid upon the attempt which has been made to elucidate the derivation of the accepted scientific titles—often a darkly obscure matter; but it cannot be said that the author is always happy in his conclusions, and the way he expresses them. Rubeus, for instance, is not "a bramble," nor is rubeta accurately translated "a bramble-bush"; while in the former Latin word the quantity of the first syllable is given wrongly, and in the latter it is not given at all. Ερυθρός, again, is not the Greek for red, as it is said to be under the heading of Redbreast. In cases of greater obscurity it is an inadequate treatment of the difficulty boldly to adopt one, extremely disputable, theory, such, for instance, as to derive ruticilla, the generic name of the redstart, thus: "from rutilus, red, and cilla, meaning the tail, but the etymology of the second element is not known." This solution is certainly not more probable or convincing than the alternative which is named only to be refuted. It would also have been better to have avoided the split infinitive with more consistency; while by one carelessly framed sentence the impression is given that the thrush feeds in autumn on turnips and potatoes, instead of in fields devoted to their cultivation.

A Varied Life: a record of military and civil service, of sport and of travel in India, Central Asia and Persia, 1840-1902. By Gen. Sir Thomas E. Gordon. (Murray, 15s.)—Sport and military service take up a large part of this book, but it differs from the biographies of many soldiers in the fact that the author's long life in the East brought him into personal contact with five Central Asian sovereigns. Sir Thomas Gordon is, moreover, an accomplished Persian scholar with a considerable knowledge of Persia, so that what he has to say about that part of the world will be read with interest and respect. He tells us that in 1866 he began a prose translation of Omar Khayyam which remains unpublished to this day: he took it with him to Tehran in '89 and read it over amid Persian surroundings, but was forced to the conclusion, at which others also have arrived, that the mystic poet is not nearly so well known or so popular in his own land as is Hafiz. This attention to Persian literature, however, was only the recreation of a busy soldier, who has many soldier tales to relate. The story of the guard which always saluted cats, under the impression that the soul of a Governor of Bombay had transmigrated into the body of a cat, is in particular to be commended, and the remarkable resemblance which Sir Thomas Gordon bore to his twin brother, also a general, is the cause of many amusing stories. The author is inclined to be somewhat diffuse, but the fault is not uncommon and can be forgiven in a book which does not pretend to be "history," and which gives a fine example of the useful life of a soldier.

British Flowering Plants. By W. F. Kirkby, F.L.S., F.E.S., with one hundred and twenty coloured plates showing the most important characters of each plant figured and one hundred and nineteen illustrations in the text. (Sidney Appleton, 5s. net.)—It is always a difficult thing to get the exact information required out of a work on flowers; generally it results in obtaining a sonorous Latin name and some highly technical particulars which do not aid in any way to the recognition by the amateur of the flower in question the next time he sees it; or the book may be so "popular," that a buttercup in its illustrations can hardly be distinguished from a ranunculus. Between these the author claims that this volume steers a happy medium course. It follows the classification of Babington's ninth edition and also notes some of the insects which feed upon or frequent the various plants described, such as the nut-weevil, whose maggots are to be found inside the nuts, and the butterflies that haunt clumps of nettle. By the way the author repeats that old story as to the edibility of nettle tips in spring. We wonder if he himself has tried it; we hope not; we have, and the conclusion came to was that it was specially intended for starving people.

Essays upon the History of Meaux Abbey and some principles of Mediæval Land Tenure; based upon a consideration of the Latin Chronicles of Meaux (A.D. 1150-1400), by the Rev. A. Earle, M.A. (Brown & Sons.) The author starts with the fairly well-known fact that the people in the centuries under consideration were an unconsidered quantity, the great landowners, the Earl of Albemarle and the Religious Houses being the influencing factors around and in Holderness. A list is given of the Abbots down to the Dissolution, and the amount of stock owned by these monastic farm-owners. The second part of the book, dealing with Land Tenure in the Middle Ages, is interesting in that it illustrates the strength of the "entail" principle, an heir being able to claim and recover all land that had ever been alienated in any way by any of his ancestors. The author gives chapter and verse for all his statements and this is especially valuable when he refers to the bondsman and the disabilities under which he lived. An impartial judgment is given on the effect of the presence of such religious bodies as the monks of Meaux on rural England, and of their absorption of the revenues of livings. This is a book full of interest and suggestion in which the reader is not offered any ill-digested theories, but left to draw his own conclusions.

Augustine the Man (Lane, 5s. net) is the title of a charming little play by Amélie Rives (Princess Troubetzkoy) or rather, perhaps, not so much a play as a dramatic poem in four scenes. The first shows us St. Augustine in Carthage, living happily enough with his mistress Melcara and his little son Adeodatus, to all appearances a sensible, gay and learned pater familias. But there is already stirring within him a spiritual restlessness. He finds his literary triumphs Dead Sea fruit, and pines for he knows not what; and in a long and very learned discussion with his friend Antonius, we hear the cry of his soul. In scene ii. he is at Milan; here we have a very dramatic parting from Melcara, for the call has come and he is preparing for the religious life. In scene iii., Augustine is in his conventual establishment, the Villa Verecundus at Cassiciacum. Here, too, is Adeodatus, a young novice, in whom the world is fighting against grace. The scourge cannot free him from the cravings of the flesh:

Last night the nightingales . . . the nightingales . . .
All night they sang . . . I could not sleep for it.
And something seemed to answer in my heart
And drew me that I followed where they sang,
And listened, praying not, but rapt away
Into a paradise unknown to Christ,
For I was there alone . . .

And anon

Came the young Roman poet through the night,
Singing of mortal love in lovely words
Set to the music of the nightingales . . .
And then . . . Oh, then I took the little scourge
I had made me, as a memory of my Lord,
And scourged myself till He remembered me
Who had forgotten Him . . .

And in the last scene, "Augustine at Tagaste" we see the death of Adeodatus and the agony of his father's grief—the grief of "the man" Augustine, the father, the husband (in effect) who is the subject of Princess Troubetzkoy's poem. Her blank verse is often delightful and always melodious, and she reaches heights of passion which affect the reader with the sense of yet greater powers restrained.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

THE MEDICI Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters.

These Plates are the product of a new method which ensures absolute fidelity in the rendering of form, and a presentment of the colour of the originals such as has heretofore seemed impossible of realisation. No "screen," regular or irregular, such as spoils the majority of modern reproductions; no "grain" from lithographic stones; no arbitrary engraver's "hatching," "line," or "stipple"; and finally, no "glaze" or "coating" on the paper used, mar these prints. The publishers believe that what photography has done for the student of form, these prints will do for the student and lover of form and colour. The delicate adaptability of the medium employed is such that, for example, a reproduction of a fresco by LUINI seems veritably a fresco in surface; the plate after LEONARDO's cartoon in the Brera almost appears an original water-colour. The publishers will send a full Prospectus and Note upon the Medici Prints post-free to all applicants. They have arranged to facilitate personal inspection of the Prints by intending purchasers at any address within the United Kingdom.

The First Issue will consist of Three Plates never before, to the Publishers' knowledge, reproduced in Colour:—

i. BERNARDINO LUINI: 1475(?)–1533

HEAD OF THE VIRGIN MARY, after the Fresco now in the Brera Palace, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 10½ inches.)

ii. LEONARDO DA VINCI: 1452–1519

HEAD OF THE CHRIST, after the unfinished Cartoon now in the Brera Palace, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 10½ inches.)

iii. ALESSANDRO FILIPEPI, called BOTTICELLI: 1447–1510

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD, Painting in tempera on wooden panel now in the Museo Poldi Pezzoli at Milan.

(Size of plate, 24½ by 17½ inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 9½ inches.)

THE ANNALS OF COVENT GARDEN
THEATRE, 1732–1897.

By HENRY SAXE WYNDHAM.

2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. net. With 45 Illustrations. [Sept. 6.]

It is impossible to imagine a subject more fraught with romance and anecdote than the history of a great theatre, and in writing the history of Covent Garden, the author has had to pass under review a host of extraordinary people. There are few figures in theatrical or any other history, that are more eccentric than was that of JOHN RICH, the founder of the theatre; JOHN BEARD, GEORGE COLMAN, JOHN and CHARLES KEMBLE, MACREADY, CHAS. MATHEWS and MADAME VESTRIS are all striking personalities, and their history might almost be called a romance. The author has striven to omit nothing that is of importance in the century and three quarters over which the history of the theatre extends. Stories of the two fires, the O.P. riots, the first nights of The Rivals, She Stoops to Conquer, The Lady of Lyons, London Assurance, etc., and other famous events are also told.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE question of spelling reform, which was revived lately in this country on the publication of Professor Skeat's lecture delivered before the British Academy, has received a fillip from the characteristically impulsive action of Mr. Roosevelt. The President of the United States has decreed that all Presidential messages and other documents emanating from the White House shall be spelled according to a preliminary schedule of reforms drawn up by Professor Brander Matthews, the head of the Simplified Spelling Board which Mr. Andrew Carnegie finances. Later news is to the effect that this order is to be extended to all departments of the Federal Government.

Our correspondence columns have, for weeks past, been giving evidences of the public interest in the question. The letters have ranged from the private expressions of desire for reform and simplification to outrageous examples of the worst that may be expected; from sane counsel like that of Mr. Mayhew or of Mr. Robert Bridges, whose very interesting letter we publish to-day, to the wild, sometimes ungrammatical, sometimes vulgar extravagance of the thorough-going enthusiast on either side. For the justification of these epithets we need only refer our readers to two letters on pp. 210 and 211 of this issue. There can be no question that the leading philologists, at any rate in this country, are on the side of reform—Professor Skeat, Dr. Bradley, Dr. Murray, Professor Sweet.

That, however, is not to say that they are one and all in agreement with the hot-headed plunge of President Roosevelt, who, in his attempt to swim the Channel, takes no thought, as it appears, for wind, tide, or wave, but plunges in with a dive of which all must admire the courage while few accept the augury. Were the Home Secretary suddenly to declare that he would set aside the existing criminal law and follow a schedule prepared by a single adviser, he would be following no rasher or more clearly foredoomed a course. For the present, no doubt, it would be fairly easy to follow the prescriptions of Mr. Brander Matthews's first schedule. Inevitable disagreements will arise—to take a simple instance—between those who say "spilled" and those who say "spilt," while the word "killed," as was pointed out by the Times, must certainly be either misspelled or mispronounced. But these matters are comparatively slight. The real difficulty will arise when Mr. Brander Matthews supplements his first list by others.

Simplified spelling, as every one is aware, is only a half-way house to phonetic spelling. So much is admitted by all. And the difficulties of phonetic spelling are, as it appears to us, quite as great as those of our present chaos, though arising from an opposite reason. The pronunciation of words is almost infinitely various. We have only to turn to a letter of Mr. Evacustes A. Phipson in our issue of August 4, or of Mr. H. Drummond in that of August 11, to find a score of instances.

His and their orthography, writes Mr. Drummond, "woz" not the same as at present. Now, do the letters "woz" at all adequately represent the sound of the word as uttered by any educated person in reading the sentence? Certainly not: "wuz" is much nearer. Mr. Phipson, again, gives us "laf" and "cof" for "laugh" and "cough." The natural sounds of these words in the mouths of at least half the educated population of England is nearer to "larf" and "corf," though these two latter forms are far from representing the true sound. And unless the greatest care is taken, we shall have, doubtless, "lawn" and "lorn" spelled in the same way, when every cultivated mouth and ear makes and notes the subtle difference between them.

To the argument raised by Mr. Oswald Crawford in his letter to the Times—that we should have henceforth to be bilingual, the reformers would obviously reply that it would be our own fault if we were. They would re-edit all our classics for us in phonetic spelling! The thought would be hideous, if it were not so funny. Imagine the "modern spelling" and the "original spelling" schools of editors laying their disagreements aside and putting their heads together to print, say, Beaumont and Fletcher thus:

Cum lets be sad mi Gurls [? Gairls];
That down cast of thine i, Oлимпias,
Shos a fine soro; mark Antifila,
Just such anuthr woz the nimf Enony,
Wen Paris brort [!] hoam Helen; now a teer,
And then thow art a pece expresing fuly
The Carthidg Queen, wen from a cold see roc . . .

and so forth. Those would be great days for the old "fogies" who clung to the condemned system. "Midnight darlings" at half a crown apiece, and all the Kelmescott Press books at a penny the pound! We could almost wish the dream were true.

It will not come true in our lifetime, and it seems probable that the movement will receive, thanks to the action of Mr. Roosevelt, a serious set-back. There is no one so stubborn as your scholar; and light-hearted amateur attempts to rush in where he has been treading with caution and pains all his life will inevitably meet with his disapproval. Had a commission of scholars for both countries been convened to discuss the first steps of a sound and moderate reform, certain faults in English and American spelling might have been satisfactorily removed. Let us hope that it is not too late.

There has been interesting news lately of excavations into Roman remains in two parts of the world. At Rome the indefatigable Commendatore Boni has been busy under the column of Trajan, making his way into the sepulchral chamber in the western side of the pedestal, which he has now opened and made accessible by its old doorway. It was discovered empty, thanks doubtless to the depredators of the Middle Ages. A hole made by mediæval treasure-hunters has been filled up with cement; and several large fragments of the laurel wreaths forming the lower torus of the column have been taken out of it and will be restored to their old place.

It is interesting to note that a discovery made by Commendatore Boni, as announced in the Times, seems to lend colour to his favourite theory that the height of the column marked not the altitude of the hill (which would have been higher than the Capitoline) removed to make room for Trajan's forum, but the depth of the depression filled up by the Ulpian forum. His recent excavations have revealed an old paved road under the concrete pavement of the court of the Bibliothecae on either side of the column; a road which had evidently been buried beneath the Ulpian forum and was actually cut through by the foundations of Trajan's column. If this road belongs to the same period as the Republican tomb of Bibulus hard by, it is impossible that the supposed hill can ever have existed.

At Mont Auxois, between Paris and Dijon, the Archæological Society of Semur in Burgundy is excavating the Gallic town of Alesia, where Vercingetorix, chief of the Arverni, made his last stand against Julius Cæsar in B.C. 52. A forum of the Augustan period, a theatre, and many traces of other monuments have been discovered, besides statues, bas-reliefs and other things. Incidentally, the discoveries are said to support a view expressed by Napoleon III. in his life of Cæsar.

A good many admirers of Stevenson may not be familiar with a characteristic and playful letter he wrote in his Samoan home in the summer of 1891. About that time R. L. S. wanted to adopt the little daughter of his friend and neighbour, Mr. Ide. Annie H. Ide spent a part of every day in the Stevensons' bungalow, and on her complaining that, having been born on Christmas, she was defrauded of the rights of a birthday, Stevenson without delay wrote to her father. The letter began: "I, Robert Louis Stevenson, advocate of the Scots Bar, author of 'The Master of Ballantrae' and 'Moral Emblems,' civil engineer, the owner and patentee of the palace and plantation known as Vailima, in the island of Upola, Samoa, a British subject, being in sound mind and pretty well, I thank you, in body. Considering that I," the document in legal phraseology proceeds, "have attained such an age that I have no further use of a birthday," and that he had found the father of the said Annie H. Ide "about as white a land commissioner" as he required, "I have transferred to the said Annie H. Ide all and whole my rights and privileges in the thirteenth day of November, formerly my birthday, now, hereby and henceforth the birthday of the said Annie H. Ide, to have, hold, exercise, and enjoy the same in the customary manner by the sporting of fine raiment, eating of rich meats, and receipt of gifts, compliments and copies of verse, according to the manner of our ancestors. And I direct the said Annie H. Ide to add to the said name the name Louisa—at least in private—and I charge her to use my said birthday with moderation and humanity, the said birthday not being quite so young as it was, and having carried me in a very satisfactory manner since I can remember."

To this document Robert Louis Stevenson set his "hand and seal on the nineteenth day of June in the year of grace eighteen hundred and ninety-one," witnessed by Lloyd Osbourne and Harold Watts.

It was stated in the ACADEMY of July 28 that the Sunderland Public Library Committee had been compelled, by the protests of the readers, to reinstate in their Library the banished daily papers. We understand that this statement is incorrect. The Committee has not changed its policy, introduced in March 1905, of excluding daily papers and fictional magazines; and it is found that since, in accordance with our suggestion, the better class of periodicals has been offered to readers, the numbers have been increased.

A correspondent directs our attention to the fact that for some weeks past it has been impossible to obtain either the descriptive or abridged catalogue of the pictures of the foreign schools at the National Gallery. It is unfortunate that the supply should be exhausted at this holiday season when catalogues are so much in request, but we are by no means sorry to learn that a new edition is necessitated. It must be confessed that the catalogues of our principal galleries leave a great deal to be desired, and both as regards information and attractiveness are far behind those of continental museums, notably those of Berlin, Dresden, St. Petersburg, The Hague and Stockholm. What is wanted in an official catalogue is a condensed summary of the latest results obtained by the researches of modern critical authorities, a precise description of the works exhibited, an indication of their date and pedigree and the conditions under which they were executed. Some account of the artists, classified into schools, must also be given, but the extended biographies and personal tittle-tattle dear to the British cataloguer are unnecessary and undesirable. If Sir Charles Holroyd can bring the National Gallery catalogue into line with the best continental publications he will increase that debt of gratitude which we owe him already.

Mr. Thomas Brock's marble statue of Thomas Gainsborough, R.A., which was exhibited at the Academy this year, has been placed in position in Room VIII. at Millbank, so that the President of the Society of British Sculptors is now represented at the Gallery by no less than four works. Without wishing in any way to disparage Mr. Brock's art, we cannot help feeling that this representation is disproportionate when we remember how many equally able British sculptors remain wholly unrepresented. Mr. J. M. Swan, our English Barye, has only paintings to show us in this gallery. Of Mr. Gilbert there is but a solitary and by no means adequate example, while our younger and non-academic sculptors are entirely ignored. Taken collectively the statuary at Millbank cannot fail to give the foreigner a feeble and false idea of the powers of British sculptors.

At Bethnal Green Museum there is now on view a large portion of the Asiatic collection of Lord Curzon of Kedleston, made by him in the course of his travels in the East during the last twenty years, and notably during the seven years from 1898 to 1905, when he was Viceroy and Governor-General of India. The collection illustrates chiefly the Art of India, Burma, Nepal and Tibet, but specimens are also included of the art productions of Turkey, Persia, Afghanistan, Siam and China. It thus embraces in a single survey the majority of the countries on the mainland of Asia and presents a comprehensive picture of some at least of the principal artistic manufactures of the East, as well as many interesting personal mementoes of Lord Curzon's term of office in India. The collection will remain on view for some time and will be varied or added to as occasion arises.

A limited company has been formed to give a four weeks' season of German opera at Covent Garden after Christmas, to begin on January 14. In addition to the evening performances, some matinées will be given, and moderate charges will be maintained throughout the house. The repertory includes Der Fliegende Holländer, Tannhäuser, Lohengrin, Tristan, Die Meistersinger, Die Walküre, Fidelio, Der Freischütz, and one complete novelty at Covent Garden—Smetana's Die verkaufte Braut. In mounting the Wagner works an earnest endeavour will be made to reproduce Bayreuth conditions, more especially as regards the instrumental music on the stage. The singers engaged for the leading rôles are of European reputation, and in addition to these the list contains the names of several eminent English singers. The performances will be under the direction of M. Ernest van Dyck; a competent German chorus and a well-known Wagnerian stage manager (from Germany) have been engaged, and the London Symphony Orchestra retained for the entire season. Herr Felix Mottl, of Munich and Bayreuth, and Dr. Kiotta, of Amsterdam, will be the conductors, assisted by Mr. Carl Armbruster, who undertakes the direction of the chorus. A full list of the performers engaged will shortly be issued.

The Three Choirs Festival is to hold its one hundred and eighty-third meeting this year at Hereford on Sunday, September 9, and Tuesday to Friday, September 11 to 14, inclusive. On the Sunday afternoon there will be a special musical service in the Cathedral; Tuesday is given up to the Elijah, with a concert in the evening at which Dr. Elgar's The Dream of Gerontius will be preceded by a new Sacred Symphony in F, Lift up your Hearts, composed for this festival by Dr. H. Walford Davies. On the Wednesday morning will be performed Sir Hubert Parry's Psalm of the Poor, The Soul's Ransom, for soprano and baritone solo, chorus and orchestra, a new work composed for this festival. The Wednesday evening concert includes two new works: Mr. Herbert Brewer's Three Elizabethan Pastorals for solo and orchestra, and Mr. Josef Holbrooke's Orchestral suite No. 2, Childhood. On Thursday, The Apostles, and in the evening Berlioz's Te Deum and the Hymn of Praise; and on Friday The Messiah.

LITERATURE

THE DREAM AND THE BUSINESS

The Dream and the Business. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.
(Unwin, 6s.)

It is not enough for a novelist to have imagination. That is a gift that most people have in a larger measure than is commonly supposed. It is easy to say—and it is said a thousand times a day: "I can imagine what he thought of it;" or: "I can fancy what she felt." For the novelist, a further step is necessary. Just as to the making of poetry there must go something more than a flight of fancy—the effort of brain and will which follows up that flight, striving, often painfully and laboriously, to grasp it, to absorb and master it—so to the making of good fiction there must go something more than the imagining of fictitious people in fictitious circumstances. It is not enough for the novelist to be able to imagine what this one thought of it or the other felt: he must go on to think with this and to feel with that; to put himself in the place of his characters, identify himself with them, not watch them from outside. There must be sympathy as well as the reflected observation which we call imagination.

Of the strength and subtlety of Mrs. Craigie's imagination there was never any doubt. Of all the functions of her brilliant mind, none was better performed than that. She had to a rare degree the power of picturing to herself subtle, complicated, people, products of an artificial society, of seeing them clearly, keeping all their apparent self-contradictions unified in one character, grasping their elusive aims, hopes, fears and sorrows. She watched the world about her with wise, keen eyes; she watched the world below her with equal wisdom and keenness. An incessantly active brain examined and judged; when she came to use the results of this observation on a work of imagination she constructed characters whom all could recognise, complex and elaborate as they were, for true types of human nature.

And there she stopped. The further step she was unable to make. She could understand exactly what each of her characters would feel in given circumstances: she could not sympathise—feel with them (we are speaking, of course, of her literature only: that she had in a very high degree sympathy in the sense of a desire to alleviate suffering, the story of her life bears witness). And a fact at first sight strange is that this lack of sympathy is able to nullify the effects of her piercing understanding: it can upset "psychology" and lead to an entirely false view of a character which readers entirely incompetent to have imagined such a character for themselves can easily discern to be misleading. Let us take an instance from "The Dream and the Business." Lady Marlesford, a young married woman who has fallen in love with a man not her husband and believes that Lord Marlesford is deceiving her, comes for advice to her friend James Firmalden, a well-bred and cultivated dissenting minister, who is secretly in love with her himself:

"I am not of the type that can live with half my nature perpetually on the rack and the other half drowsy. I must live all over in order to live at all. I cannot exist, on the present terms, with Basil. We must separate. . . . I do not choose to wait until his life and mine are so wrecked that nothing can be made of either. He can do much with his: I can still work out mine."

"That will never do. Nothing is worse than a formal separation—except an informal one."

"Ah! Then you think that a divorce is the one course possible—in such a case as ours?" . . .

"If you want me to defend divorce, I will defend it," he said.

"I myself am utterly opposed to it," she answered; "all I wish you to realise is this—that while I am determined to leave Basil, I am quite aware that to be legally separated but morally bound for life would be, to both of us, but to him especially, servitude in despair. Bad as it will be, it cannot be so bad as the wretchedness he must feel now in deceiving me, or my wretchedness in trying to act as though I suspected nothing. Own that I am talking reasonably."

"Too reasonably," said Firmalden. "But are you quite sure that he cares for somebody else?" He wondered how much she knew.

"I am certain," she replied, "that he no longer cares, as he once cared, for me. How much he loves—this other—I cannot say."

"Has he any idea that you have noticed any change in his manner?"

"No; he is too absorbed in himself to think about me at all!"

"But isn't it hard," he asked, "to say what a man might or might not notice in a woman? He's often a dumb dog who cannot speak."

"Then such dumb dogs should not marry!"

The discussion goes on; and Firmalden, characteristically, insists that there is no half-way house: either she must divorce her husband, or bear with him altogether. The other woman, whom Lady Marlesford is anxious to screen, must be either exposed altogether, or left altogether alone. And Lady Marlesford cries:

"You are unfair—too unfair. I am going to tell you something which I never meant to tell you. The woman you won't let me spare, the woman you think I want to screen for paltry worldly reasons, is your own sister! It is Sophy!"

"That's a lie! They have lied to you. It isn't true!" he exclaimed, springing to his feet.

"It is perfectly true."

"I wouldn't believe it if she herself confessed it. I wouldn't believe the evidence of my eyes if they denounced her!" . . .

"Is Sophy alone, out of the whole world of women, immune from temptation?"

"She is so little immune from it, that she would recognise it and thus avoid something which might prove too strong for her."

"When women love exceedingly, they do not recognise it as a temptation. They think it the supreme blessing of their lives. When they renounce it, they do so for the man's sake—not for their own. This is the history of all women who have loved with any depth. It is perhaps the one sure test of their earnestness. Otherwise," she added, shrugging her shoulders, "it may all be curiosity or caprice or mere viciousness. I am willing to give Sophy credit for as many struggles as you please."

"I can swear to her innocence."

"I myself do not believe the worst. But for no other reason than this—I am willing to judge of her conduct by my own. You, when you thought her a strange woman, had no excuse for her—not one."

"I would not ask you to spare her—if she were guilty—though she were twenty times my sister."

"Every woman is some man's daughter, and often some man's sister!"

"But unhappily, every brother cannot feel so certain of his sister's character as I can of Sophy's. She has many failings, but she is utterly incapable of dishonour."

"Then perhaps you will admit, for argument's sake, that I too am incapable of dishonour, and that not we two only, whom you happen to know, are incapable of it, but that numbers of women, whom you do not know, are incapable of it. You say you would not accept the evidence of your own eyes if they denounced her!"

"I would not."

"Well," said Tessa, giving him her hand, "have as much faith in me—no matter what happens!"

It cannot be denied that the whole long scene from which we have chosen these extracts is, intellectually, brilliant: the question of divorce (Lady Marlesford is a Catholic) is most ably discussed; the thoughts of the disputants are as clear as daylight. But is that the way in which they would have talked? Is that the way they would have behaved under such conditions? Lady Marlesford's brain we see: where is her heart, her passions? Where are the spretæ iniuriæ formæ, and the sickness of desolation that no woman, however "refined," however sophisticated, could escape in such circumstances? Would any man, however strongly self-controlled, hear his sister called a wanton and proceed to discuss the likelihood of the charge being true? The author, with that keen intellect, that eager interest in moral and religious questions and the relation to them of men and women, has forgotten that no amount of culture, thought and sophistication will eradicate certain deep-rooted emotions. She has held her characters under the glass, watching their brains at work: to their hearts she has not penetrated. And so we get the old impression of unreality—or, rather, of partial reality, of lack of sympathy, of inability to be really dramatic, really one with the characters of the story.

Nevertheless, the book is of absorbing interest—not so much for the fortunes of the people as for the elucidation of or comment on topics of great moment, religious, moral and social, round which the thoughts and difficulties of the characters are grouped. As is not uncommon in Mrs. Craigie's later novels, the story follows the course, not of one or two protagonists, but of a group of people. There is Dr. Firmalden, of the old school of Protestantism, his son James, of the new; James's sister Sophy, a woman who clings of choice to the old law though her tastes have much in them of the Pagan; Lady Marlesford, the devout but semi-Pagan Catholic, and her husband—a pair of devoted lovers whom a strange incompatibility of mind prevents from being friends; Lessard, the utterly Pagan musician, whom Sophy refused to marry because of his "atheism," and with whom Lady Marlesford later falls in love; and Nannie Cloots, otherwise Rosanette de Verney, actress, formerly betrothed to James Firmalden. Nannie is one of the most striking pictures of underbred vulgarity, meanness and folly we have met in fiction. The portrait may not be fair on actresses as a whole; by itself it is masterly. And it is the loves and religious difficulties, and the two combined, of this group which we follow. Of all, the story of Tessa Marlesford moves us most. She is so good in intention, so feeble in performance; so completely a prey to her yearnings for a perfect love, and her striving after utility and interest in life, so pathetic in her vain wanderings hither and thither—to Firmalden, to her confessor, to her husband—for satisfactions of these longings, that we feel for her a deeper sympathy than we can find to bestow on any of the others. All people know such marriages as that of the Marlesfords: their sadness is all the greater for the apparent needlessness, the seemingly trivial but ineluctable causes, of their failure.

The book is full of wisdom, clear thinking, illuminating discussion of states of mind and soul. And, in the earlier chapters, at any rate, we find much of the old epigrammatic brilliance of the earlier novels. Its perusal leaves one cold. The sense of effort in construction, of labour in the working rarely leaves us: we close it with the feeling that here is a fine novel marred by the old lack of sympathetic interest in human nature.

THE AENEID IN SPENSERIAN STANZAS

Temple Greek and Latin Classics. The Aeneid of Virgil. Translated by E. FAIRFAX TAYLOR, with an introduction and notes by E. M. FOSTER. Two vols. (Dent, 2s. 6d. net each.)

THE introduction is short, but bright and original. Here is a characteristic passage:

Virgil has not travelled much, and he has never been introduced to a hero. The things he really understands are not heroic—the dancing reflection of water on a ceiling, the whizz of tops in the courtyard, the departure of colours at nightfall, sea that trembles under the moon, the poor woman who must rise early, obscure deaths, the sufferings of animals and flowers,—and these things contrast oddly with the conscientious robustness of their setting. The art of Virgil seems the wrong way up—if we assume that the art of Homer is up the only right way. . . . It has been given to him to shed the light that never was on sea or land, but he uses it, so to speak, as a search-light, illuminating objects that are often isolated and sometimes contradictory. . . . Let us not equip him with any scheme. Above all let us not make him too tearful or too mellow. For that is the direction in which modern eulogy, following the example of Tennyson, would seem to tend.

Thus Mr. Foster, B.A., who does not seem to think very much of the poet. He blames Virgil because he (Mr. Foster) sympathises more with Dido than Aeneas. But great poets have a way of arousing sympathy even for the person not primarily intended to evoke it. The late Sir Henry Irving had a feeling for Shylock, which the present writer confesses he largely shares. The notes are elementary, chiefly on geography and history.

Mr. Taylor, the translator, seems to have formed a higher estimate of Virgil as a poet. He has chosen the Spenserian metre, the complexity of which, as well as its recurrent nine-lined stanza with the sledge hammer fall of the Alexandrine at the end of each, whether the meaning demands or repudiates it, obviously unfits it to represent the steady and even flow of the hexameter. But he has certainly shown great dexterity in the handling of the metre, and generally makes us believe that the Alexandrine is not out of place, that the narrative really does run in stanzas of nine lines. There have been of late so many versions of the Aeneid that nearly all has been said that may be said, no matter how charming the topic. Quite recently we reviewed Mr. Billson's faithful and literal and often musical and powerful version in blank verse. We will now give some specimens of Mr. Taylor's art (Aen. i, 157-173):

Tired out the Trojans seek the nearest land
And turn to Libya. In a far retreat
There lies a haven; towards the deep doth stand
An island, on whose jutting headlands beat
The broken billows, shivered into sleet.
Two tow'ring crags, twin giants, guard the cove,
And threat the skies. The waters at their feet
Sleep hushed, and, like a curtain, frowns above,
Mixt with the glancing green, the darkness of the grove.

It needs not to be said that in a metre so elaborate there must often be an omission or an interpolation in the interests of the rhyme. Ascanius in the English:

Longs to hear
The tawny lion issuing with a roar
Forth from the lofty hills, and front the foaming boar.

But in the original there is no "roar." On the other hand, "one cave protects the pair" hardly represents:

Speluncam Dido dux et Trojanus eandem Deveniunt.

And, in the same context (iv. 170-173) five lines are too many for two and a half in the Latin:

No more she meditates to hide the stain,
No longer chooses to conceal her flame.
Marriage she calls it, but the fraud is plain,
And pretexes weaves, and with a specious name
Attempts to veil her guilt, and sanctify her shame.

The rendering:

Dear guest no longer as a husband known fails to convey the pathos which drew tears from Virgil when he recited the passage before the court of Augustus; and:

Hen furiis incensa feror is far better rendered by Thornhill's

Ha! That way madness lies, than by Mr. Taylor's:

The Furies drive me to despair.

Again:

Changeful is woman's mood, and varying with the day is not half so poetical as Conington's prose:

A thing of moods and fancies is a woman.

The curse of Dido (iv. 621-629) is very vigorously done, and so is the dying scene:

Deep gurgles in her breast the deadly wound;
Thrice on her elbow she essays to rise,
Thrice back she sinks. With wand'ring eyes all round
She seeks the light of heaven, and moans when it is found.

We must protest against Iūsus with long penult (v. 843), and against "Tell the stars that rise," for surgentia sidera dicent in the famous imperialistic passage in Bk. vi., which is well rendered, but "tell the stars" could only mean "count the stars" and dicent must mean "name" not "count." In the simile (viii. 380) of the whipping-top, vacua atria, is not "empty courtyards" but "empty halls"; the words, as Conington saw, are meant to indicate that the boys were sons of nobles, and whipped their tops in the spacious halls of palaces.

We do not find in any of the many versions which we have read the princely dignity of the words in which Evander welcomes Aeneas to his humble home (viii. 364, 5):

Aude, hospes, contemnere opes, et te quoque dignum
Finge deo, rebusque veni non asper egenis.

This is the passage of which Dryden wrote: "I am lost in the admiration of it: I condemn the world when I think of it, and myself when I translate it." Certainly a good deal of the kingliness has evaporated in Mr. Taylor's:

Dare thou to quit thee like a god, nor dread
To scorn mere wealth, nor humble cheer disdain.

Far better, though less smooth, is Mr. Billson's:

Thou too, O guest, scorn riches and put on
A God's great heart, not rough to poverty.

The picture of Camilla in Bk. vii. and the episode of Nisus and Euryalus in Bk. ix. are excellent. We must give a short extract from the latter (435-440):

So doth the purple floweret dying droop,
Smit by the ploughshare. So the poppy frail
On stricken stalk its languid head doth stoop,
And bows o'erladen with the drenching hail.
But onward now through thickest ranks of mail
Rushed Nisus. Volscens only will he slay;
He waits for none but Volscens. They assail
From right and left, and crowd his steps to stay.
He whirls his lightning brand, and presses to his prey.

The last words of the episode (446-449) compare favourably with Conington's metrical version.

O happy pair! if aught my verse ensure,
No length of time shall make your memory wane,
While throned upon the Capitol secure
The Aeneian house shall reign and Roman rule endure,

Conington is less dignified and more diffuse:

Blest pair! if aught my verse avail,
No day shall make your memory fail
Prom off the heart of time,
While Capitol abides in place,
The mansion of the Aeneian race,
And throned upon that moveless base
Rome's father sits sublime.

We will conclude with Mr. Taylor's very spirited rendering of the closing lines of the Aeneid:

Wrathful in arms with rolling eyeballs stood
Aeneas, and his lifted arm withdrew;
And more and more now melts his wavering mood,
When lo! on Turnus' shoulder—known too true—
The luckless sword-belt flashed upon his view;
And bright with gold studs shone the glittering prey,
Which ruthless Turnus, when the youth he slew,
Stripped from the lifeless Pallas as he lay,
And on his shoulder wore as token of the day.

Then terribly Aeneas' wrath upboils,
His fierce eyes fixed upon the sign of woe.
"Shalt thou go hence and with the loved one's spoils?
'Tis Pallas, Pallas deals the deadly blow,
And claims this victim for his ghost below."

He spake and mad with fury as he said
Drove the keen falchion through his prostrate foe.
The stalwart limbs grew stiff with cold and dead,
And groaning to the shades the scornful spirit fled.

GEORGE FARQUHAR

The Mermaid Series. George Farquhar. Edited with an Introduction and Notes by WILLIAM ARCHER. (Unwin, 2s. 6d. net.)

JEREMY COLLIER'S "Short View" was published in March 1698; in the following December, Farquhar's first play, Love and a Bottle, was produced at Drury Lane, containing, as the Biographica Dramatica holds, "the best drawn rake we have ever had on the stage." In March 1707, while the author lay dying, was produced at the Haymarket his best play, The Beaux' Stalagem, which contains the scene (Act v. sc. iii.) between (Francis) Archer and Mrs. Sullen in the latter's bedroom. Between Roebuck and Archer come Sir Harry Wildair, Lady Lurewell, Richmore and Mrs. Mandrake, Kite and Plume. And yet Farquhar is the author of whom Mr. (William) Archer, with all the seriousness but none of the fatuity of Dr. Schmid, maintains that he marked an advance in the morality of our comedy. "More clearly than any of his contemporaries, he was progressing towards a sane and humane form of comedy." It sounds paradoxical; but we believe Mr. Archer to be right in his pretty flat contradiction of Dr. Ward's verdict on the Irish rogue who came to London, wrote six original plays, adapted another from Fletcher, and died destitute (but for Robert Wilks's charity) in his thirtieth year. To put him in the worst light first: Roebuck is too hideously depraved to be real; the business between Wildair and Angelica is detestable; Lady Lurewell (for all Hazlitt's admiration of the development of that character in Sir Harry Wildair) is monstrous; in all the comedy of the age there is only one person more horrible than Mrs. Mandrake, and the scene between Archer and Mrs. Sullen—a strange piece of work for a man on his death-bed—is unblushingly licentious. Moreover, Farquhar's heroes are all rakes and adventurers, or both. Even Worthy, the most serious of them all, only changed his dishonourable designs on Melinda into honourable wooing when her inheritance put her virtue beyond his means to purchase. Intrigue and seduction are the common themes of his work, and his gentlemen talk of marriage as the extreme price to pay for the satisfaction of their desires. But it is useless to try to base the morality of a play on its incidents. We must accept the manners and morals of the age for fact; the gentlemen and ladies of the day—we are forced to believe—did behave like that. Farquhar shows us, quite as clearly as the plays of Wycherley, Congreve, or Vanbrugh, a very corrupt state of society. It is often claimed for the England of that age that it is not fairly represented in its comedy; that the playhouse was the diversion of the Court and the aristocracy and gave a picture of their manners only, to the exclusion of the virtues and good sense of the mass of the people. In that aspect, Farquhar is a little disturbing. He left the Court and the aristocracy, the small circle of the "little parish of Covent Garden," and went for some of his people and scenes to the country. And there he shows us a Mr. Justice Balance, who is in sentiment one of the most cynical and immoral old rogues in all literature; Worthy, of whom we have spoken before; Rose, a country girl whose innocence is an accident she deeply regrets—all seeming to imply that the country was no better than the town in matters of love and courtship. If it had been otherwise, could Silvia have talked as she did talk and would her farcical behaviour with Rose have been tolerable to an audience? The other alternative appears to be Squire Sullen, who is an even lower specimen of a man than the jolly town-rakes who come to disturb his household. Against these, indeed, we have to set Cherry Boniface, who atones for the weakness which was regarded as inevitable in women by courage and fidelity, and Dorinda, who, lax enough in thought and admitting the weakness of women more freely than a modern view of her sex would permit, shows good sense, honour and generosity.

But the morality or immorality of an author depends not so much on the types of character and the incident with which he deals as on the use he makes of his material; and Farquhar's use of his material seems to us such as to justify, or very nearly to justify, the claim made for him by Mr. Archer. Where Steele avoided immorality by achieving mawkish sentimentality at the expense of verisimilitude, Farquhar clung to life as he saw it about him, widened the bounds of comedy to embrace a great deal of life that had been excluded before, and yet succeeded in setting the sun a-shining on it in place of what Mr. Archer calls the "black, bitter, cruel atmosphere" of Wycherley, Congreve and Vanbrugh. They were, in their manner, gay; but their gaiety is often hideous—the gaiety of cynical, scoffing demons. The gaiety of Farquhar (which Dr. Ward so strangely denies him) is a material, spontaneous, sunny gaiety, the gaiety not only of a jolly dog of an Irishman but of a man of a simple, kindly and generous nature. There is more love of his fellow men and delight in their oddities and humours in George Farquhar than in any other writer of his day. His characters (though some of them, it is true, are but puppets) have a pliancy and a buoyancy about them which makes them very human. They are not merely fashionable; even the fashionable ones among them are men and women too. His few plays present us with a whole gallery of oddities, jolly rogues, pert maids, fine ladies, villains and honest men, very different from the hide-bound wits of the "smart" comedy. The fact was, of course, that Farquhar was not by birth or acquirement a member of "the coterie," as Mr. Archer calls it. He was not a man of rank, wealth or fashion, but a literary adventurer who had the world to conquer and conquered it by entering it and enjoying its varied humours, classes and characters. It is that sunny gaiety, that delight in life, which is his distinguishing characteristic. It sweetens all his pages, even the worst, and wins forgiveness from modern readers for many violations of modern manners. For at his worst he is, strictly speaking, not so much immoral as non-moral (to use the old tag). He simply is not concerned with whether his people is good or bad. He knows that they are great fun, and insists on our sharing his boyish delight in them. Hence, he is to a great extent a farcical author, not a comic. When he ascends to the level of comedy, as in passages pointed out by Mr. Archer, he proves himself on the side of the angels, a man of good sense, independent thought and kindly feeling. And the older he grows, the wiser and the kindlier he grows. The gaiety of The Beaux' Stratagem is not a whit less sunny, less buoyant than that of The Trip to the Jubilee or Love and a Bottle. It is finer, too, and mellower; less wanton and irresponsible; more subordinated to the dramatic necessities of the play, more penetrated by the natural sweetness of the author's temper. Meanwhile the wisdom and kindly feeling have grown under his adversities. If Aimwell and Archer are no saints, neither are they repulsive libertines nor grinning cynics. Aimwell proves himself a gentleman. His sudden confession has been called improbable: it is no more sudden, and to our thinking far better founded, than that of the gay Lord Quex. And if Archer is a rogue, he is a lovable rogue, and one who shows some advance in morality on the standpoint of Sir Harry Wildair, still more of Roebuck.

On another matter Mr. William Archer gives us as sound and valuable a piece of criticism as anything that has been yet written about Farquhar. He points out that Farquhar's dramatic technique is an improvement on that of Congreve, Wycherley, or Vanbrugh, in more than one respect. It must be admitted, it is true, that most of his plots are farcical, often badly put together—the sub-plot having little connection with the main plot—disjointed and clumsy. There are cases where he seems to have forgotten, as he went on, what he intended to do. For instance, we have always suspected that Cherry Boniface was meant to be proved no daughter of her supposed father—possibly with the intention of discovering her to be of gentle birth and of marrying her to Archer: we hear nothing of this later, and she is fobbed off as maid to Dorinda. But Farquhar's technical advance on his contemporaries shows itself first of all in his treatment of his characters, whom he allows to explain and to reveal themselves, instead of describing them before they enter and then leaving them to represent the type described—a type easily recognisable to the audience as one of themselves. The change is mainly due to this, that he is not content with types; he must have individuals. And, going outside the bounds of society for his characters, he found human nature to be so complex a thing that it could not be labelled and classified; it must be shown. The other important point in his technique is this: that, although the stage in his day was still a rhetorical stage, and still, to a great extent, the magazine and lending library, even the pulpit, of the town, he managed to do without the general remarks, the set disquisitions, the deliberate comment on life which so often held up the action in the plays of his contemporaries. Once more, he writes to show life, not to explain it; and his criticism of it—including the valuable criticism on marriage in The Beaux' Stratagem, on which Mr. William Archer has wise words to say—is conducted by example, not by comment. The fact is, as Mr. Archer explains, that the essay was then beginning to be successful, and Farquhar knew what to leave to the essay and what to keep to the stage. It is quite possible that, had he lived till sixty instead of dying at thirty, the poor Irishman might have become, as Mr. Archer rather obscurely puts it, a Fielding of the theatre: that is, might have done for the drama what Fielding did for the novel, and raised it to a position in art and truth equal to that held by the novel. Looking back over the hundred and fifty years that followed him, we must cry: Would that he had!

It only remains to say that Mr. Archer's edition is, as would be expected, scholarly and trustworthy. The four plays he gives are The Constant Couple, The Twin Rivals, The Recruiting Officer, and The Beaux' Stratagem. Love and a Bottle we can well spare; Sir Harry Wildair we should have liked, and to omit The Inconstant is to omit one of the best of Farquhar's plays. Still, if space had to be considered, the four plays we are offered form the most representative part of Farquhar's work. For the text of The Constant Couple Mr. Archer has gone to the second Quarto (1700), giving in an appendix the original (and preferable because shorter) version of the ending of Act v. sc. i., that between Wildair and Angelica. The Twin Rivals and The Beaux' Stratagem have been collated with the first Quartos, and in The Recruiting Officer the first and second Quartos have been used. Textual matters are clearly dealt with, and the stage history of each play, references to contemporary history and other matters are adequately explained in foot-notes, in which the editor acknowledges his indebtedness to another sound scholar, Mr. W. J. Lawrence.

ANACREONTEA

Anacreon. Translated by THOMAS STANLEY. With a Preface and Notes by A. H. BULLEN, and Illustrations by J. R. WEGUELIN. (Bullen, 6s. net.)

WE are glad to see a new edition of Thomas Stanley's delightful "Anacreon," illustrated by so dainty and refined an artist as Mr. Weguelin. It is more than two hundred and fifty years since Stanley published his translations, and, though they came long after the Rebellion had all but stifled the flow of English song, they have the best qualities of the Elizabethan lyric outburst. Stanley was a gentleman and a scholar, a pupil of Thomas Fairfax, son of the Edward Fairfax who translated the "Gerusalemme Liberata." Returning from the Continent in the midst of the Civil War, he shut himself up in the Middle Temple, where, according to the Life quoted by Mr. Bullen in a footnote: "Neither the Cares nor Concerns for his Family, nor the Caresses and Endearments of a Young Wife could prevail with him to intermit his ordinary studies on which he was obstinately bent." He published a learned edition of Aeschylus, composed love-songs for music, wrote a History of Philosophy after the manner of Diogenes Laertius, and translated the Anacreontea. A good all-round scholar, a great linguist, and no small poet, this Thomas Stanley.

He was not the first in the field with the Anacreontea, and Mr. Bullen's erudite introduction and notes give many details of earlier translations. The Anacreontea were first published in 1554 by Henri Estienne of Paris, who had shown them to Ronsard in manuscript, with what delightful results the readers of the poet know. The full story of the manuscript (now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris, having formed part of Napoleon's loot from the Vatican and never having been returned to its right owner) its purchase by John Clements, the friend of Sir Thomas More, and its subsequent adventures, may be read in Mr. Bullen's introduction, and a very interesting piece of bibliography it is. The poems, of course, are not all of them, possibly none of them, the work of Anacreon; they are later poetry, the earliest probably dating from three centuries later than the poet of Teos. But that they are delightful in their facile elegance there can be no denying, and it was not long before English poets began to make use of the French discovery. The first to borrow from the volume was Greene, who in his "Orpharion" (1589) translates the ode Μεσονυκτίος ποτ' ὦραις, which tells how Cupid came knocking at the door on a wet night, and being admitted drew his bow on his host:

He pierced the quick, and I began to start;
A pleasing wound, but that it was too high:
His shaft procured a sharp, yet sugar'd smart:
And he flew, for now his wings were dry;
But left the arrow sticking in my breast,
That sore I grieve I welcomed such a guest.

Stanley's translation is better than Greene's; it is closer to the original and has more of the inimitable lightness and mischief of the Greek:

When well warm'd he was, and dry,
"Now," saith he, "'tis time to try
If my bow no hurt did get,
For methinks the string is wet."
With that, drawing it, a dart
He let fly that pierc'd my heart;
Leaping then, and laughing said,
"Come, my friend, with me be glad;
For my bow thou seest is sound
Since thy heart hath got a wound."

We prefer, indeed, Stanley's version—which has, by the way a beautiful opening—even before that of the "mysterious" poet, A. W., whom Mr. Bullen has done so much to introduce to modern English readers. A. W., whom no one has yet been able to identify, is one of the best poets among the Elizabethan song-writers, and his songs include three odes from the Anacreontea: Θέλω λέγειν Ἀτρείδας, Φύσις κέρατα ταύροις, and the ode quoted above. Another Elizabethan to draw from the same source was the author of the song "Cupid, in a bed of roses," that occurs in Thome Bateson's "Second Set of Madrigals," 1618; and very many others have been indebted to the same collection: Herrick, Cowley, Rochester, Prior, Oldmixon, Ambrose Philips, Tom Moore, Byron—these are some of the names given by Mr. Bullen, and the list could doubtless be increased. It is interesting, and may strike some as a little strange, that George Crabbe heard John Wesley, preaching at Lowestoft in 1791 in the eighty-eighth year of his age, quote Cowley's translation of a famous ode from the Anacreontea: "Oft am I by women told, Poor Anacreon! thou grow'st old."

It is not surprising that poets, ancient and modern, should have been tempted by the Anacreontea. There is about the Greek a deceptive air of ease, which, when you come to analyse it, is not so easy to imitate as it appears. This little collection of songs of love and wine has the quality which the best of the Elizabethan song-books have, a perfect and apparently inevitable agreement between thought and language. Not a word could be moved or altered without injury. Their spontaneity, their gracility, to borrow a word from the Latin, is perfect. Their context is a mere nothing, a jest, a tiny tale, a praise of drinking, a praise or a flouting of love.

Ἡ γῆ μέλαινα πίνει, πίνει δὲ δένδρε' αὖ γῆν,
πίνει θάλασσα δ' αὖρας,
ὁ δ' ἥλιος θάλασσαν,
τὸν δ' ἥλιον σελήνη·
τί μοι μάχεσθ' ἑταῖροι,
καὶ τῷ θέλοντι πίνειν;

The outburst is so fresh and free that one can well imagine it extemporised by some jolly toper with his wreath slipping down over one eye; and Stanley, good though his version is, seems lame beside it:

Fruitful earth drinks up the rain;
Trees from earth drink that again;
The sea drinks the air, the sun
Drinks the sea, and him the moon.
Is it reason then, d'ye think,
I should thirst when all else drink?

And Cowley's paraphrase, delicious if we had not the Greek original, is very long-winded and heavy with those seven galloping lines before us.

But to see the Anacreontea at their best we must turn to two odes in particular: "Roses" (the Τὸ ῥόδον τὸ τῶν ἐρώτων of the Greek) and the still more famous ode to the grasshopper. Of the first Stanley's version is as follows:

Roses (Love's delight) let's join
To the red-cheek'd God of Wine;
Roses crown us, while we laugh,
And the juice of Autumn quaff!
Roses of all flowers the king,
Roses the fresh pride o' th' Spring,
Joy of every deity.
Love, when with the Graces he
In the ball himself disposes,
Crowns his golden hair with roses.
Circling then with these our brow,
We'll to Bacchus temple go:
Then some willing beauty lead,
And a youthful measure tread.

Best known of all, probably is the Μακαρίζομέν σε, τέττιξ, ὅτε δενδρέων ἐπ' ἄκρων

ὀλίγην δρόσον πεπωκώς
βασιλεὺς ὅπως αἰδεῖται.

Stanley, Cowley, Leconte de Lisle, Goethe—the versions of all these may be found in Mr. Bullen's volume; and though for many reasons we like Cowley's best, since this is Stanley's book we select his translation to close our article.

Grasshopper thrice-happy! who Sipping the cool morning dew,
Queen-like chirpest all the day
Seated in some verdant spray;
Thine is all whate'er earth brings,
Or the hours with laden wings;
Thee the ploughman calls his joy,
'Cause thou nothing dost destroy:
Thou by all art honoured; all
Thee the spring's sweet prophet call;
By the Muses thou admired,
By Apollo art inspired,
Ageless, ever-singing, good,
Without passion, flesh or blood;
Oh how near thy happy state
Comes the gods to imitate!

Stanley's Anacreontea, especially as edited by a scholar like Mr. Bullen, is a charming possession, a perpetual source of gaiety, pleasure and interest.

ISOLATION

THERE is a dread I know by night,
And sometimes in the sunlit day,
When all around me slips away
To lose me in the Infinite.

The earth's a veil—a veil the sky;
I cannot touch, nor hear, nor see;
What is, is just a part of me,
There is naught else, but only I.

IN DARK WEATHER

WHEN I was very glad
I wished the rain away;
I would not be made sad
On such a dear gold day.

But now the years move slow,
And life is full of pain.
Ah! how I feel and know
The beauty of the rain.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

DOSTOIEVSKY

It is rather strange that it is impossible, apparently, to procure to-day any of the translations of Dostoevsky's works that the late Mr. Vizetelly issued about twenty years ago. The selection then made was not a very good one, but at least two out of the five volumes published reached a third edition, and from the Press notices appended as an advertisement of Mr. Wishaw's translations, we gather that the critics who wrote in the Spectator, the Scotsman, the Morning Post, and the Athenæum were more delicately alive to their duties than are the majority of reviewers to-day. These translations, however, appear to have sunk out of sight, along with innumerable versions of "The House of the Dead," that masterpiece of Dostoevsky's which narrates life in a Siberian convict prison; and now the only novel still procurable is Miss Milman's version of "Poor Folk," published by Mr. John Lane. The present generation of English readers knows not Dostoevsky. So much the worse for the present generation!

No doubt the reason for our neglect of the great Russian author lies in the Englishman's fear of morbidity. I was delighted to find in the Spectator some years back a criticism on Mr. W. D. Howells's novels which defines our insular apprehensions in the naivest fashion. "Mr. Howells," said the critic, "is a standing proof that subtlety of analysis need not involve the slightest sacrifice of wholesomeness." The sentence conjures up a comforting little picture of idyllic, wholesome surroundings, say a vicarage lawn, where the pleasant clatter of tea-things is punctuated by the vicar's voice rising sonorously amid the cries of "deuce" and "vantage" from the sunk tennis-court. Dostoevsky would be a strange and ironical guest here, nor is he in place in a London club, hotel, in any well-to-do house or suburban villa residence. There is little "wholesomeness" to be sacrificed in most of Dostoevsky's novels, but his analysis of the workings of the minds of his sick and suffering people, of the weak, the tormented, the criminal, and the possessed, show us just what value is to be placed on "wholesomeness," and how the underworld of the suffering or thwarted consciousness yields us insight into deep, dark ranges of spiritual truths for ever denied to healthy, comfortable, normal folk. Yet Dostoevsky's work demonstrates what every experienced physician knows, that no hard dividing line can be drawn between the world of health and strength and the world of disease, weakness and insanity; and that all our normal impulses and acts will shade, given the cruel pressure of circumstance, into the abnormal in an infinite, finely wrought net of deviations, all of which are, psychologically, of import. Dostoevsky's peculiar and unique value is that of the great writers he is the one who stands furthest down the slope of that deep underworld of tortuous, diseased impulse, he is the one who has established best the relation the abnormal bears to the normal mind, and the one who has most fully explored the labyrinthine workings of the mind unhinged, impaired or thrown off its balance, while still mixing with and surrounded by the world of normal men. And Dostoevsky's lifework may be likened to a long winding road, traversed by the subtlest and most deep-seeing of psychologists, who at every turn is seen questioning, listening to and commenting on the strange experiences and confessions of crowds of mental patients, some almost normal, and some insane.

The immense power and underlying sanity of Dostoevsky's own mind is best attested by the perfect clarity, calm, penetrating judgment, and classic objectivity of "The House of the Dead" (1862). There is not a line of exaggeration, not one word of sentimentality here. The whole life of the convict prison, the character of the prisoners, their relations one with another and with their jailors, the effect of their work, punishments and pleasures, the hopes that sustain and the fears that torture these chained human animals in their grim environment and the common bond of humanity between the inmates, whether dangerous murderers or ordinary normal folk, all are painted with the marvellous precision of touch and delicate truth of a master painter. The accompanying morbidity and erratic abnormality of Dostoevsky's brain, on the other hand, is well attested by the fantastic confusion and startling divagations in the motives and impulses of his favourite characters, his sick and possessed heroes, suffering from hallucinations, with whom the author temporarily identifies himself and then suddenly parts company from just when the reader is beginning to get alarmed and wonder whether he himself has wandered into an asylum. In "The Idiot" (1868) while Dostoevsky's unrivalled intensity grips the reader with undiminished force, we are unpleasantly conscious of doubts as to whether the sane are insane or the insane are sane, so spasmodic and irregular is the development of the situations. Visitors to asylums know well the peculiar suspicious and alert expression with which doctors and attendants sometimes favour the sane as well as the sick, and Dostoevsky's scenes are sometimes as startling as a conversation in which a stranger who has been talking with great intelligence is suddenly detected putting out his tongue at his neighbour and the next instant continuing the conversation as though nothing had happened. In "Crime and Punishment" (1866), however, though the subject is the analysis of the tortuous reasonings of a mind on the borders of delirium, first trying to justify the right to murder and then struggling with the consciousness of its guilt, the author holds with a fairly steady hand the flickering lamp by whose light we follow the intricate mental processes of the criminal's motives and acts. There is sentimentality here, and a certain love of melodramatic situation which, joined to confusion and complexity, are the defects of many of Dostoevsky's pages; but these, though serious artistic blemishes, do not seriously impair the force of his psychological genius. In "The Brothers Karamazov" Dostoevsky has established his greatness beyond question. The book has a breadth and depth of vision, a temperamental richness and sustained intensity which characterise great tragedy. In his portraits of the corrupted, diseased and suffering Karamazov family, Dostoevsky has probed the human soul of all who are victims to their own vicious past and infirmity of will. The indissoluble relation between human vice and human suffering, and the thesis that the sinner is the man infected with mental, moral or physical malady, are shown and maintained with a fertility of psychological insight drawn from the storehouse of national suffering. It is not surprising that Dostoevsky should be the author most beloved by his countrymen, for that broad human tolerance and fraternal feeling peculiar to the Russian soul is so strong in the atmosphere of "The Brothers Karamazov" as to destroy all desire in the reader to condemn the Karamazovs, when once he has penetrated to and understood the driving force behind their actions.

It is much to be regretted that no English translation of this great novel exists, though there are two versions in French. But the most remarkable example of Dostoevsky's genius contained in a comparatively short compass, that is accessible to the English reader, is the story entitled "The Permanent Husband," translated by Mr. Wishaw and published in 1888. Dostoevsky has written more powerful and more enthralling works, but as a piece of sustained psychological analysis of the passion of jealousy it is unique in literature. It is moreover such a good example of Dostoevsky's method that I make no apologies for giving the reader a short analysis of the story, instead of passing hurriedly in review the sanest, most normal and most harmonious of all Dostoevsky's works, the posthumous novel, "The Adolescent."

The hero of "The Permanent Husband" is a certain man of the world, Velchaninov, who, through financial difficulties of two years' standing, has lost his gay, careless, healthy pleasure in life, and has grown irritable, morose and mistrustful. Detained by a lawsuit in Petersburg and feeling worried and ill in body, Velchaninov has met in the street four times in the last fortnight a certain gentleman with crape round his hat, who has stared at him in a peculiarly fixed way. Velchaninov feels that he certainly has met this person before somewhere, but he irritates himself to no purpose by racking his memory, and he feels puzzled and ill at ease that thrice he has got angry and agitated at the recollection of this man's face. On the night of the last occasion on which he has been met and stared at by the man, Velchaninov awakes trembling from a very unpleasant dream of some crime of which he is accused by a continuous swarm of people who pour into the room without ceasing, and approaching the window he is staggered to see, in the light summer Petersburg night, that the man with the crape hatband is standing on the other side of the street carefully examining the house. The man then crosses the road and enters the gateway, and Velchaninov, trembling, runs to the front door, and, after waiting and hearing him trying the doorhandle to see if it is locked, suddenly flings the door wide open and confronts the midnight visitor.

Both men stared in each other's eyes silent and motionless. So passed a few moments, and suddenly like a flash of lightning Velchaninov became aware of the identity of his guest. At the same moment the latter seemed to guess that Velchaninov had recognised him. In one instant the visitor's whole face was all ablaze with its very sweetest of smiles.

The midnight visitor turns out to be a certain Trutsotsky, the insignificant husband of a woman, Natalia Vasilievna, "one of those women who exist only to be unfaithful wives." Velchaninov nine years ago has acted the part of her lover during a whole year in a little provincial town; he had been the slave of his passion, and he had been suddenly "thrown over like an old worn out shoe" by Natalia in favour of a new lover, a young artillery officer. The husband, Trutsotsky, had never discovered his wife's infidelities. And now, after nine years, behold! the husband turns up quite unexpectedly, a little drunken and maudlin, to announce his wife's death and "to talk over that sweet mutual tie of which Natalia formed so treasured a link in our friendship." The dialogues that ensue between the two "old friends" are masterpieces of psychological insight. Velchaninov is very much on his guard, but Trutsotsky is always springing disconcerting surprises on him and taking strange liberties while narrowly scrutinising him. When Velchaninov pays Trutsotsky a return visit he discovers him in the act of:

trying to persuade a little girl to do something or other, and using cries and gestures, and what looked to Velchaninov very like kicks in order to effect his purpose.

The girl, seven or eight years of age, is in a very hysterical condition. She runs away when Velchaninov appears, and the latter, on mentally comparing dates, discovers to his horror that she must be his child. She has his own eyes, his own hair and refined pallor of face and her mother's lips. Trutsotsky has a disagreeable grin when he speaks of his affection for his daughter, and Velchaninov surmises that he has long been playing on the child's nerves, bullying and ill-treating her. After a good deal of mental fencing between the two men, the real father is great agitation succeeds, in carrying off Liza on a visit to the house of some old friends, a charming family to whose care he confides her. One of the most terrible pages in literature is that in which the child, Liza, on her arrival, begs to implore Velchaninov to "help" her, because she knows that Trutsotsky will hang himself. The child cannot be appeased in her terror and anxiety, and Velchaninov goes back to find Trutsotsky, but the latter will not come, he has just heard of the death of his dear friend, Bagantov, who was also one of his late wife's acquaintances. And now Trutsotsky, with a smile of detestable cunning and irony confides to the alarmed Velchaninov that:

When Natalia died, she left behind her a little black desk, and there were about a hundred examples of Bagantov's literary genius in the desk, ranging over a period of five years.

But Velchaninov remembers, to his relief, that he had never written a single letter to the dead woman.

We have no space left in which to tell how Liza dies, and how Trutsotsky plays cat and mouse with his wife's lover, till the hour comes when he tries to murder him in his sleep. The final analysis of Trutsotsky's motives is of extraordinary brilliancy, and indeed every page is a revelation of the depths of the human consciousness. Trutsotsky does not know that he wishes to murder Velchaninov, but the hatred is at the bottom, underlying his other feelings. The essence of Dostoevsky's method here is surprise. We are first of all carefully prepared for something abnormal to happen, through the analysis of the hero's neurosis, and then there is sprung on him and us a series of surprises, through the medium of unexpected arrivals, unforeseen revelations, bad dreams, and lightning-like divinations. Bit by bit the chain of cause and effect is unwound, and the reader has the uncanny feeling of the subconsciousness of the characters being made to yield up, piecemeal, curious hints of the revelations in store. Dostoevsky is par excellence a psychologist, unsurpassed in his knowledge of the workings of the human mind exposed to abnormal strain. It is small wonder that Nietzsche hailed him as his master, for many of the most brilliant ideas of the German philosopher are to be found, either crystallised or in solution, in the pages of the great Russian.

FICTION

Children of Far Cathay. By CHARLES HALCOMBE. (Hongkong Daily Press Office, 6s.)

EXPERIENCE has equipped Mr. Halcombe, more fully than most Englishmen, to write a novel of Chinese life and character. For in an extract from a literary journal, printed on a front page of his book, we read with interest: "My life and adventures in China where my life was heroically saved by a young Chinese lady who is now my wife were recorded . . ." and the extract ends with the name of the book in which these absorbing details are recorded; its price too and publisher are generously added. This would assure him a unique opportunity of studying the domestic manners of the Chinese and of learning much which would escape the observation, however acute, of the ordinary Fang-qwai or foreign-devil.

But, although he starts with this capital advantage, thus delicately advertised, he is handicapped partly by his inability to express himself grammatically or clearly, and partly by his ignorance of the form he has chosen. The construction is on a level with the style: and the style suggests nothing so vividly as a tract (writing which little boys are sometimes given to throw fluttering from railway carriage windows to improve the moral standpoint of the platelayers) and a tract which on occasions takes wing from chatty inconsequence to the lurid heights of a Penny Dreadful (writing which little boys have been known to treasure crumpled and coverless in their jacket pockets). Two passages will explain:

A young girl, passingly fair, and I regret to say equally fickle, and a dark and somewhat tall young man, well set though slender and decidedly handsome, were standing together in an old-fashioned garden bordering upon the Lancashire coast. I may add that it was a pleasant spot, from which a glimpse of the sea was obtainable on that sultry July morning in the year 1896, of which I am speaking.

This is taken from the introductory chapter: it tells how Montrose, the decidedly handsome young man, was jilted by the young girl and became an unattached missionary. His broken heart is doubtless meant to lessen any shock that might be caused by his future marriage with Luh-Hwa, the charming daughter of Hung-Fong. But if, as they say, marriages are made in heaven, this one surely was. For only Fate could have worked the tremendous coincidences which bring the couple into each other's arms.

The other passage is taken from the scene where Hung-Fong is being tried by the iniquitous judge, Shun Ming, on a false charge of conspiracy.

The claw-like hands of many hirelings who were accustomed to these scenes gripped the manly form of the merchant, and hissing curses in his ear they once more banded him forward and drew his lacerated hand down upon the blood-stained document. Another rude character was compulsively made and the signature was complete.

But any book which throws a new light, however, smoky, upon a strange people must have some interest. And there is much that Mr. Halcombe knows about the Chinese. Though, of course, he does not interpret them as Lafcadio Hearn interpreted the Japanese, yet he can describe the interior of a Chinese house, and little isolated details of custom or points of etiquette in a way that holds the fancy. Facts nail him down to simplicity; and show what a fine background he has spoiled. He wastes too much energy in killing dead dogs. No one now thinks that the Chinese are all rat-devouring heathen: every one knows that there are many courteous Chinese gentlemen. Continued insistence on this point robs the book of virtue which it can ill spare.

I know a Maid. By E. MARIA ALBANESI. (Methuen, 6s.)

WE wonder how often in real life a will has been destroyed by the person who would have been disinherited by it? We suppose that, if no one but a dying man saw you do it, you would not be in much danger from the law, provided the man died without speaking. The witnesses might or might not be alive, but they could not produce the will or prove that you had made away with it. Indeed, all the probabilities would be against a document so hostile to your interests ever reaching your hands. In real life the improbable often happens: the difficulty is to make it seem like fact in fiction. Lady Otterburne's crimes do not suit her complexion: and one of them, which in some of its details recalls a cause célèbre, leads to nothing, and, we believe, could have led to nothing. A promise of marriage extorted from a minor by a clumsy subterfuge would not be worth the paper it was written on, and the promise of money made under the same conditions and with the same absence of formalities would not have bound Sara Lavington to pay a penny. Sara is a charming heroine, and, indeed, Madame Albanesi has written another pleasant story. But villainies are not in her atmosphere, and when she tells you of them she fails to convince you. She sees the world through kindly eyes, and she gets her best effect of reality in such a character as Natalie Benyon, whom some love and others hate, and who is a lifelike mixture of good and bad. Lady Otterburne, in spite of her crimes, is lovable too: in fact, her charm remains and her sins vanish into the limbo that must be full of sins half-imagined and never committed. Most novelists have helped at one time or the other to fill it.

The Trials of Commander McTurk. By C. J. CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ. (Murray, 6s.)

MR. CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ has let loose another energetic and sinewy adventurer upon the high-seas of romance. His heroes are nothing if not strenuous, and it is no surprise to us to learn that Commander McTurk was placed upon the retired list of his country's navy for excess of zeal rather than for inefficiency. The story of his struggles to regain his lost prestige is both pathetic and enthralling. Even the adamant hearts upon the Naval Board at Washington are touched at last by the audacious exploits of the "man in the flaxen wig," and we leave him embarking upon a second career in the American Navy. As he has, by this time, been annexed by the most capable of all the amorous ladies who pursue him through his many and stirring adventures, we hope that his ardent spirit may be kept within bounds and his country may continue to smile upon him. The flaxen wig, which earns him the name of "Wiggy McTurk" in the Navy, is as important an attribute as the concertina of that other ocean free-lance, Captain Kettle. Indeed, these irrepressible sea-dogs have much in common. The artistic vein, which finds vent in the poetic rhapsodies of Kettle, inspires McTurk to execute weird, impressionist sketches in oils. The description of the meeting between these kindred spirits, whose friendship is sealed for ever by their common appreciation of the beauty of the sunset at Halifax—McTurk pressing his sketch of the harbour upon Kettle, while the latter melodiously warbles his "Lines to the Sunset," to the tune of "Greenland's Icy Mountains"—is worthy of the subject. That, between them, they should succeed in kidnapping two prominent American millionaires, making them work their way to England before the mast, is not surprising. The quixotic commander is blessed with a sister, Bridget McTurk, whose golden transformation is as unruly as her brother's flaxen wig. Her efforts to rescue him from his various matrimonial entanglements are untiring. We meet another old friend in these pages. Mr. Neil Angus McTodd, of Arctic fame, spends a portion of his thirsty existence as chief engineer to Commander McTurk, during which period he covers himself with glory by impersonating a submarine in mid-ocean, and frightening out of his Teutonic wits the captain of a German ironclad.

Tally Ho! By HELEN MATHERS. (Methuen, 6s.)

JUDGED by comparison with certain of Miss Mathers's earlier novels—"Cherry Ripe," "Comin' Thro' the Rye," and others—"Tally Ho!" is a sad disappointment. The school of writers to which she belonged is slowly dying out, and we opened her latest book with no little expectation, sure that we should find at least good characterisation, a healthy atmosphere, and mild and pleasant diversion. We find, instead, great possibilities and a failure to realise them. Tally Ho! was a famous steeple-chaser—in his way a very Katerfelto—disguised as a hunter. A good story well told, with a fine horse for a theme, would have excited and delighted us. Unfortunately, confident expectations notwithstanding, we find no cure for sore eyes in these pages, nothing to set the hot blood racing madly to the pounding of galloping hoofs—who, of those who know, has not felt the thrill of it, and swept helter-skelter into the rush? But this is not really the story of Tally Ho!; it is rather the story of San (a girl, by the way), and of a not incorruptible “splendid brute,” one Blaise Blundell, Major, gentleman-jockey. Here we have a combination full of promise, particularly when coupled with a devouring passion on the part of the man to win the Blue Riband of the Chase; a famous steeplechaser, bequeathed to the lady, a Diana of the hunting-field who abhorred racing, with conditions which blocked the gallant Major’s way; and three girls who do their own stable work and perform impossible feats of horsemanship. In truth, there is good material enough and character enough to have made a fine novel, and Miss Mathers might have made it. But no gleam of merriment, no sparkling phrase, not a line of vivid description rewards the reader. Miss Mathers has failed in her construction, and she has failed in her characterisation. We find Blaise—how much better was the original “Blaze”—anything but a gentleman, and shall never believe that the San we are shown would have married him. Nor does Miss Mathers realise the possibilities, and the limitations, of her honest lad from Galway. He would not “negotiate” stone walls and water-jumps on or off a racecourse—he would lep them. He would not speak of a horse winning “off his own bat—blindfold”; he might say: “Troth, an’ he’d win with his head in a bucket.” Miss Mathers should know, too, that the lowliest Irish peasant does not drop his h’s. “Tally Ho!” is not without its good points; we are disappointed that it is no better, and we lay down the book to read Whyte-Melville again.

DRAMA

THOMAS WILLIAM ROBERTSON

THE success of the dramatic author (the artist, not the man of business) is complete only when his appeal proves universal and effectual—only when there is no member of his audience whom he has not succeeded in affecting, and in affecting to the full extent required. Universality of appeal is only possible, of course, in the case of plays of universal truth—in the case of plays which deal, that is to say, with what, in life and nature, is common to us all; but, the question is largely one of treatment too. For, though the subject of the dramatist is common, universal life and nature, it is local life and individual nature which constitute his medium of expression. He cannot deal directly with a given situation in the abstract. He must create a concrete instance of it, and can approach it in the abstract only through that instance. The instance, too, must be particular; it must consist, that is, of actual events peculiar to individual persons. For, were he to deal with characters which are merely the embodiment of traits and with events of general application, then although the extent of his appeal would be assured, the strength of it would not. His play would then be but an allegory, as much a disquisition as a story. The more particular his instance, the more effectual his appeal will prove. But, the more surely his appeal is strong, the less so is it, in itself, extended; for the more particular the instance, the less clear is its connection found with the abstract situation which it typifies. In order, therefore, that his appeal may be not only effectual but universal too he has to treat the concrete instance as if it were the abstract situation, tracing and establishing, as he proceeds, the connection between the two, supplementing and expanding by the certain appeal of the general the chance or partial appeal of the particular. In dealing with a character, for example, he must explain its relation to the type it represents and, if necessary, the relation of the type to all the world.

It is necessary to understand all this if the services to English drama of Thomas William Robertson are in any exact degree to be appreciated. By the middle of last century the law which governs extent of appeal had not, of course, been framed, though its existence was suspected. But, if the need was felt of some kind of elaboration, the exact kind needed was misjudged, and the investment of the unit with the significance of the type was practised as exaggeration only. Because even the expanded fact, unemphasised, is somewhat ineffective in the theatre; what was thought, unemphasised, to be so was not the expanded but the literal fact. The necessity to expand had been confounded with the necessity to exaggerate. The faithful, either to nature or to life, was considered unsuitable for treatment. To this, no doubt, the unproductiveness of the time was largely due; for the theatre had become not only ridiculous but a thing of ridicule. To this must be assigned in full the caricatures—“stage types,” as they are called—and the false and highly-coloured views of life with which “the play” is still in part identified. To the work of Robertson is due to a great extent the credit of the fact that the theatre deals effectively to-day with life and men and women as they are. To him we very largely owe it that exaggeration is at length discredited.

It is only, however, so far as Robertson replaced the existing method by the new that the whole and actual credit should be his, for it is only so far that his personal achievement was complete. The exaggerated undoubtedly possesses in the theatre a certain broad effectiveness of its own; and, had Robertson deprived his facts of this and yet not made them any reparation, his influence could not have been conclusive. What has made it in great measure so is that, at least as far as character is concerned, he replaced exaggeration by expansion. In this respect he not only substituted the faithful fact for the exaggerated but justified his action by making it the more effective, of surer and more general interest than the exaggerated fact had ever been. As regards event, his achievement was but partial. In dealing with it he discarded exaggeration, but in a measure only. He substituted the faithful fact for the exaggerated, but not entirely. His stories attempt to show life as it is: but what they really show is life idealised—life only less exaggerated than in the common practice of the time. They are but fairy-tales—tales only partly true to life—and neither were nor could have been expanded. Their interest, like that of every story which is of less than universal truth, depends upon the personal taste and passing mood of each spectator.

It must not be assumed, however, that Robertson realised entirely the nature or the extent of his achievement. The aim which he deliberately pursued was the substitution for exaggeration of fidelity. This, as it appeared to both himself and his contemporaries, cannot be more happily or vividly expressed than in the words of Ruskin. The critic had seen a performance of Ours and was writing a letter of thanks to Mr. Bancroft:

I was disappointed [he said] with Mr. Hare’s part (the Russian Prince Perovsky); not with his doing of it but with his having so little to do. However, that was partly my mistake, for I had a fixed impression on my mind that he was to wear a lovely costume of blue and silver, with ostrich feathers, and, when he was refused, to order all the company to be knouted and send the heroine to Siberia.

What the Prince does actually, of course, is to wear the clothes that he would wear in life and to accept his defeat with dignity and grace. But, if Robertson was conscious of one part of his achievement, of the other—the re-statement of expansion—he seems to have been entirely unaware. There is no evidence that he understood the fundamental law, to which he proved a friend, more clearly than had those who proved its enemies. His observance of it was almost certainly intuitive; for it is only in certain cases that he honours it—those which the conditions of his life enabled him to understand most fully—and, had he realised the need of it in character, he surely would have realised the need of it in story too.

In view of this, it seems a fortunate chance which led him, in his dealing with events, to discard exaggeration but in part, to replace it only partly by fidelity. For had his facts been altogether faithful his comedies could scarcely have succeeded and would not, perhaps, have even been produced. They would have lacked the illegitimate effect which is the product of exaggeration—the effect to which the public was accustomed—and also, in any case in plot, the legitimate effect arising from expansion and due emphasis which would have reconciled it to the loss. If Robertson's intention was entirely to discard the artificial, all that he accomplished was to blend it very subtly with the natural. Revolutionary as his comedies were thought—revolutionary as they were—they owed at least as much to the old as to the new; and it is, we may be sure, no less the exaggerated than the faithful which gained the first of them a hearing. It is not Caste but School, not the most faithful but the most unfaithful, which proved the most successful of all.

It was only, then, in character that Robertson substituted for the exaggerated the expanded. Now, the result of the employment of expansion and the proof of it as well is that character is generally understood, not merely recognised, and that event is generally accepted as true to probability and fact. Let us take the case of Caste. Caste is not only the most faithful of the comedies, it is by far the best in all respects. The evidence suggests that, for reasons which need not be explained, it is the only one which does the author justice. What, then, do we find when we apply to it the test proposed? Can we believe, in the first place, that what happens in the play would probably have happened in real life? George D'Alroy is determined to marry Esther Eccles, a ballet-girl of poor extraction. Captain Hawtree is anxious to dissuade him.

What should prevent me? [asks George] The inexorable law of caste [is the reply]; the social law, so becoming and so good, that commands like to mate with like. . . . Those marriages of people with common people are all very well in novels and plays on the stage, because the real people don't exist and have no relatives who exist and no connections; but in real life, with real relations and real mothers and so forth, it's absolute bosh; it's worse, it's utter social and personal annihilation and damnation.

The marriage takes place, however, and George himself does not regret it. "If I'd known I could have been so happy," he murmurs, when leaving for the front, "I'd have sold out when I married." Eventually even the Marquise, his mother, is reconciled; and, with the lines: "True hearts are more than coronets And simple faith than Norman blood," the argument is clinched as follows:

Caste is a good thing if it's not carried too far. It shuts the door on the pretentious and the vulgar, but it should open the door very wide for exceptional merit. Let brains break through its barriers, and what brains can break through love may leap over.

It is George's return from the dead which reconciles his mother to his wife. All who can believe in the return can readily believe in the rapprochement—but can we all believe in the return? Is it not, rather, less probable than possible—to be accepted or rejected, as we please? And, supposing that we believe in the rapprochement as a fact, can we believe, as Robertson would have us, in its permanence? "We must take her abroad and make a lady of her." "Can't, mamma," says George; and some of us, at least, agree with him—not adding, as does he, "she's ready made." Was he, indeed, "so happy" with her before he went to India? Did she never offend his sensibilities?

Then I was in the ballet. Then I was in the front rank—now I am of high rank—the Honourable Mrs. George D'Alroy.

Did he always find her quite congenial? Did he never feel ashamed of his father-in-law? Did he never, even, resent his sister-in-law, with her "Bless you, my turtles," and her "George, kiss your mother"? Some of us, at least, agree with Hawtree:

Under ordinary circumstances she's not a very eligible visitor. . . . This is rather a wild sort of thing in sisters-in-law. . . . But in real life . . . it's utter social and personal annihilation and damnation.

Can we, on the other hand, understand the characters? Is there any of them, rather, that is fully understood by all of us? Take Eccles in any scene; he is always himself, yet always, too, the possible self of each of us. Take him when the Marquise calls and offers to rear and provide for her fatherless grandson.

It's the marquiss in her coach. Now, girls, do be civil to her, and she may do something for us. . . . This way, my lady—up them steps. They're rather awkward for the likes o' you, but them as is poor and lowly must do as best they can with steps and circumstances.

Esther discovers that he has written for help: "My lovey, I did it with the best intentions." She declines it.

Better do what the good lady asks you, my dear; she's advising you for your own good and for the child's likewise.

Reference is made to the discomfort of the home.

It is a poor place, and we are poor people, sure enough. We ought not to fly in the faces of our pastors and masters, our pastresses and mistresses.

Esther shows her mother-in-law the door.

Very sorry, my lady, as you should be tret in this way, which was not my wishes.

The Marquise leaves.

To go away and not to leave a sov behind her! Cat! Cat! Stingy old cat!

And, reflecting on the behaviour of his daughters:

Women is the obstinatest devils as never wore horse-shoes. Children? Beasts! Beasts!

What is it but the baser mood, the lower nature uppermost, of us all?

FINE ART

HOPPNER AS CRITIC

IF an eminent painter's seasoned opinions on the theory of his art and the performances of his brother-artists be worthy of respect, no apology is needed for directing attention to the little known essays on art by John Hoppner, R.A., essays which for nearly a hundred years have been undeservedly ignored by our critics and historians of art. As a painter Hoppner's place is assured among those "excellent artists" who, in the words of Sir Walter Armstrong, "made the English school of portraiture the greatest school of the eighteenth century," and it may not be wholly impertinent to this inquiry to remind the reader of the increased value now set upon his work, and of the fact that a portrait by Hoppner has fetched a higher price in the auction-room than any portrait by any other eighteenth-century master. By other writers, however, must the praises of Hoppner's practice be sung; here it is sufficient to indicate that his practice well qualified him to criticise the achievements of his contemporaries.

Although his now forgotten "Oriental Tales" and occasional poems prove Hoppner to have cherished from his early manhood some literary as well as artistic ambitions, it was not till within three years of his death—which occurred in 1810 in his fifty-first year—that he made his appearance as a critic. A pamphlet depreciating British painting and British sculpture moved Hoppner to contribute his first, and in some respects his best, critical essay to The Artist, a periodical edited by Prince Hoare, one of our numerous forgotten Academicians, whose fame is hardly preserved by his portrait of himself in the Uffizi. In the congenial task of defending British art Hoppner shows a skill and wit in controversy which entitle his essay to an honourable place in an anthology even of eighteenth-century criticism. His opening phrases are, perhaps, a little stiff and formal, after the fashion of the time, but when he warms to his subject his deep and sincere feelings inspire him to language which is at once vigorous and convincing. To the insinuation—amusing to our ears—that painters were too highly paid for their services, Hoppner roundly replies that “the few among us who can boast a slight covering of flesh fatten on abuse and neglect, and wallow in all the luxury of labour, anxiety and mortification.”

With respect to the Portrait-Painter [Hoppner continues] it may truly be affirmed that his life is not one of idleness but of unremitting industry and care. His art, when carried to any high degree of excellence, challenges our admiration and praise, for, as Donne saith,

“A hand, an eye,
By Hilliard drawn, is worth a history
By a worse painter made.”

In administering to some of the best feelings of the human breast he sacrifices health and the inestimable blessings of air and sunshine, and, in return, he sometimes receives a market price for his labours that enables him perhaps, to fill with decency the station which prejudice has allotted to him. When more than this is obtained, it is for transcendent talents that lay a debt on a nation to be repaid only in gratitude, and in a general sense of their benefit and estimation.

A suggestion that the Italian sculptor Canova should be employed to raise the Nelson Memorial monument is next indignantly repudiated, and some very pertinent comments are passed on the unnecessary and unpatriotic patronage of foreign artists when their British rivals are idle.

There are [he writes] only two occasions, I conceive, on which a foreign artist could with propriety be invited to execute a great national work in this country, namely in default of our having any artist at all competent to such an undertaking, or for the purpose of introducing a superior style of art to correct a vicious taste prevalent in the nation. The consideration of the first part of this statement I leave to those who have witnessed with what ability Mr. Flaxman, Mr. Westmacott, and the other candidates have designed their models; and with respect to the style and good taste of the English school, I dare, and am proud, to assert its superiority over any that has appeared in Europe since the age of the Caracci. Our present sculptors, it is well known, studied in Italy the same remains of antiquity that furnished examples of excellence to the native artist, and if they were not to be improved by these, I fear they are past the power of being mended by Mr. Canova.

Though he expressly refrains from “discussing the merits of Mr. Canova,” Hoppner leaves the reader in no doubt as to his opinions, and though he doubtless overrates both sculptors he would be supported by the majority of modern critics in contending that Flaxman was fully the equal, if not the superior, of Canova.

Arduous though the task must ever be to assign to contemporary artists their due place in the temple of fame, there are comparatively few of Hoppner's judgments from which modern criticism would dissent. In his second contribution to The Artist Hoppner is less happy in dealing with abstractions which have ever escaped the critic's analysis. He skilfully discriminates between Taste and Fashion, but though he inveighs against those who “deny the existence of beauty; or who refer the measure of it, at least, to every man's rude or immature opinion,” he does not provide us with any exact definitions or infallible canons of beauty. His connection, however, of “our notions of fitness and beauty,” may possibly be regarded as an unconscious anticipation of Sir Walter Armstrong's definition of beauty as “fitness expressed.”

For nearly two years after the publication of this essay Hoppner refrains from criticism, but in February 1809, he contributes to the first number of the Quarterly Review, edited by his intimate friend Gifford, a long review of Edward Edwards's “Anecdotes of Painters,” an attempted continuation of Walpole's work which provides Hoppner with many openings for appreciating the achievements of his contemporaries. In the annals of the House of Murray the authorship of this essay is attributed jointly to Hoppner and Gifford, but it is unlikely that Gifford's share in its composition amounted to more than the ordinary editorial revision. In any case we may be certain that the opinions expressed are Hoppner's own, and a comparison with his previous efforts throws doubt on any suggestion that Gifford has materially altered the painter's literary style.

Although irrelevant tittle-tattle about great artists and extravagant laudation of the mediocre are as much to be condemned to-day as they were a hundred years ago, Hoppner's strictures on the defects of the book under review are less interesting to us than his estimates of the greater among his contemporaries. The two historical painters, Barry and Benjamin West, Hoppner rates more highly than do modern critics who possibly underestimate their attainments. West, it must not be forgotten, was the first painter to abandon Greek and Roman for modern costumes in historical painting, and for this sensible innovation alone he cannot be ignored in the history of British art. Barry, again, was undoubtedly possessed of so remarkable a personality that the few who knew and understood the man must have been tempted to see in his work similar qualities. But if in these two cases Hoppner differs from present writers, he triumphantly anticipated the verdict of posterity in his fervent admiration of Richard Wilson, the Father of British Landscape.

It is not our intention [he writes] to offer an apology for the unpopularity, admitting the fact, of Wilson's character—it needs none. The man whose genius outstrips the age in which he lives, has the choice of two things—either to pander to the prevalent taste for present gain, or by the best exertion of his faculties, secure to himself, as far as man may, the approbation of posterity. If this neglected artist, among his many privations could not reckon deafness; nor in his list of acquirements enumerate pliability, it was still most absurd in his more polished patrons, however they might lament the “unsuavity of his manners,” to forego, on that account, the pleasure of possessing his works, and encumber themselves with the vulgar art of Barret.

As a warm partisan of the Reynolds faction, Hoppner might be expected to hold a much lower opinion of Gainsborough than he does. But though he appears insufficiently to admire Gainsborough's lightness of hand, his economy of means and the magically suggestive effects produced thereby, he is not unjust to Gainsborough's genius, and even ventures to deprecate Sir Joshua's faint praise of his great rival:

Could we still be satisfied that this great artist had expressed his unprejudiced sentiments, we should correct our own, and bow to his superior judgment. But firmly as Sir Joshua appeared seated in the opinion of the public, his jealousy quickly took the alarm; and of two evils, he chose rather to suffer in his own good opinion, than bear a brother near the throne. Of this feeling he has left sufficient evidence in his critique on the works of Wilson and Gainsborough, and particularly the latter, whose power of giving a just resemblance he formally denies; and as Gainsborough could boast of possessing little other merit in this department of art, he was thus annihilated as a rival. That his portraits could bear any competition with those of Reynolds, no one possessed of the least feeling for art would assert; but the aim, as well as the power of these distinguished painters, was different; and while the first was content to represent the body, it was the ambition of the latter to express the mind.

No one who has read Sir Joshua's penultimate discourse can have failed to read between the lines a more profound reverence for Gainsborough's genius than is openly expressed, and Hoppner is as right in divining the ungenerous reticence of Reynolds as he is in distinguishing between the intellectual qualities of Sir Joshua's and the emotional qualities of Gainsborough's art. When we remember Hoppner's own portraits it is surprising, not that he should rank Reynolds above Gainsborough, but that he should prove so appreciative of the latter, whose practice is widely different from Sir Joshua's and his own. Like many painter-critics he errs in condemning a painting for the absence of qualities not sought by its creator, and ignoring other beauties which it actually possesses. That the pictures of so lyrical a painter as Gainsborough should be blamed for not possessing “any just pretensions to be classed with the epic works of art” argues but a scanty recognition of his chief excellence. But though he was unable to define that excellence Hoppner felt that it was there, and he qualifies his judgments by pointedly styling them "the language of cold criticism," by warning the Academy students against speaking "slightly of what they should reverence," and by concluding with the admirable aphorism that "no great expectations can be formed of that student who is a critic before he becomes a lover."

Hoppner's fourth and last essay in criticism is a review of Hayley's "Life" of Romney, published in the Quarterly only a few months before the writer's death. To this wayward genius Hoppner finds it impossible to be generous, and difficult to be just. But then, as Mr. H. P. K. Skipton says in his little biography of Hoppner—the only one published, by the way—Hayley's "Life" is "a provoking book," and Hoppner's dislike of the man does not help him to be fair to the artist. He cannot forgive Romney for deserting "a young and amiable wife and infant child, a few months after their marriage." He seems to regard the unfortunate painter as a ruthless Don Juan, rather than as an amorous weakling, and righteously exclaims that "to marry an innocent and virtuous woman, with a determination to abandon her immediately after the gratification of his passion, argues a selfishness and hardness of heart of which we have, happily, few examples." Selfish Romney may have been, but hardness was no more in his character than in his painting. A certain carelessness and captiousness there were in both, and it is no doubt these qualities, as manifested in his art, to which Hoppner alludes as "meanness and vulgarity," "defect of taste and delicacy of feeling." Hoppner is careful to state that he has "respect for his abilities," and that he allots Romney "a very distinguished rank among the painters of the English school"; but his merits, as visible to Hoppner, are easily exhausted by the admission that the features of his men are "correctly drawn" and "well put together," that his men-portraits are "marked in the manner of Sir Godfrey Kneller," while "his females remind us more of the languishing beauty of Lely," and lastly that he "excelled in those points (unspecified) that are generally last attained even by the most diligent student."

More satisfactory as criticism is the following passage, provoked by Hayley's injudicious comparison of Romney with Reynolds:

In the marking of his heads, although he [Reynolds] indicated more knowledge than appeared in the portraits painted by Romney, yet it was not so ostentatiously displayed; while by a felicity of conception, to a superior elevation of character, he united a greater degree of identity. The graceful action of his figures, and the inexhaustible variety of his backgrounds, form a store of materials to future students, that must from its persuasive eloquence, in time become the language of every school in Europe.

The truth seems to be that the extreme sensitiveness of Gainsborough and Romney was not understood by Hoppner, who in temperament was more akin to the phlegmatic Sir Joshua. It is to be regretted that Hoppner found no opportunity for a more exhaustive criticism of the great painter whose work he admired and emulated; but its absence is to some extent compensated for by the frequent allusions to Sir Joshua which occur in three of the essays. Little has been said of Hoppner's literary style, nothing of his fondness for classical quotations and the wide knowledge which his writings display; nevertheless, the few extracts from his essays already given may indicate their tenour and persuade the reader to make their better acquaintance.

MUSIC

SCHUBERT'S UNFINISHED SYMPHONY

It has been said by one who has the right to speak that the scherzo of Beethoven's C minor symphony is "as near being miraculous as human work can be." In a sense this is profoundly true, for scarcely anywhere in musical literature is the alchemy which transmutes the common property of a musical phrase into a rare and precious substance more apparent than here. But the miracle of the fifth symphony has not the wonder of being wholly unexpected. The Eroica foretold it; even in the minuet of the first symphony there is a presage of greater things to come. Beethoven's development was steady and certain, almost terribly logical, climbing step by step from his starting-point upon the shoulders of Mozart. A more captivating maker of miracles, not because his works were greater or as great, but because an element of uncertainty made his great achievements stand out as marvels unexplained, was Schubert. The two existing movements of his unfinished symphony in B minor are the great example of this. They were heard recently at Queen's Hall and as I listened the wonder of them struck me anew. Take the first subject with its three component parts; first, the violoncellos and basses groping in darkness, then the violins waking to activity with a semiquaver figure on which the oboes and clarinets superimpose a phrase of melody filled with the definite human pathos which makes the whole articulate. The whole scheme is masterly; as in the symphonies of Beethoven, the hearer knows from the first note that the composer knows everything that he is going to say, and that here is not a note which is superfluous, which has not its place in the scheme of the whole. It is unnecessary to enlarge on the lovely melody of which it is built. The mention of the unfinished symphony starts people singing the second subject, that phrase which we always think no instrument but the violoncello could play until the violins take it up and make it more beautiful still. And then the slow movement: when I hear it I can never make up my mind whether it is one tune or twenty. It has all Schubert's own exuberance of musical idea, which both makes and mars all his work, but here everything fits, everything is relevant; there are no visible, or audible joins, but the whole sweeps on in unbroken majesty, and its dignity is the result of its perfect symmetry. The melody is perhaps not more beautiful than that to be found in the best hundred of Schubert's songs, and certainly there are passages in his other great symphony, that in C major written six years later, if not in his earlier symphonic efforts, which will stand level with the most lovely moments in this one. The lover of the "Unfinished" will quote the four bars, in which horns and bassoons spread out, as though opening a door through which the light floods, and lead the way to the second subject, as an unsurpassed piece of beauty; but a defender of the C major may point to the passage which leads back to the réprise of the first movement, with its descending suspensions and little sighs of expressive melody, as equally inspired. But apart from the fact of its loveliness—and that is a quality which all Schubert's music has even when it is faulty—the C major symphony has not this complete balance, which, within its dimensions, makes the "Unfinished" a perfect work of art. It is a bigger effort but a less perfect result.

Herein, then, lies the miracle. Two movements written at the age of twenty-five show combined all the freshness and spontaneity of his youthful nature with the collected mental attitude of mature manhood. He never completed the symphony: why, cannot be told. Perhaps he had not arrived at the power to write a finale which should transcend the early movements to form a climax to the whole, and death came too soon, before he had climbed the next mountain peak of life, while he was struggling with the problems of manhood and had not surmounted them. However that may be, this work shows what was in Schubert. When we reflect that he died at the age of thirty-one, and that at that age Beethoven had not written his second symphony, it gives some idea of what the world lost by his early death. The mass of his songs is so enormous that sometimes we are tempted to think of him as a youth endowed with a great melodic gift, the best of which was probably recorded in his short life, since pure melody and song is the gift of youth. But the unfinished symphony shows more. It shows clearly that Schubert had that faculty for attaining perfect structural balance, not only without interfering with the course of his ideas, but as the completion, the crowning grace of those ideas; in fact, that more or less latent within him were all the qualities by which he might have become one of the greatest masters of symphonic form. It is, perhaps, useless to speculate as to what might have been, but it is impossible to resist the reflection of what a field lay before such a genius of the symphony at the time when Schubert died. His unbounded gift of melody, wielded with the colossal power which the unfinished symphony shows might have belonged to him in maturer years, would have given a living impulse to the development of the symphony after Beethoven, which must have carried it on upon a surer course, and affected beneficially the whole history of instrumental music through the nineteenth century to the present day. We know how the symphony wavered and hung fire in the hands of such great men as Schumann and Mendelssohn, through the inability of the first to understand the voice of the orchestra, and the complaisantly academic standpoint of the latter. That moving first section of the "Unfinished," which I began by describing, shows how Schubert could realise orchestral utterance and make the individuality of each instrument combine in a single speech; and from the pitfall of the latter his very nature saved him.

Schumann's unerring critical faculty made him the foremost to appreciate the defects of himself and others in this direction, and led him to point out Brahms as the new prophet of the larger forms of instrumental music, and after much dissension practically every one has been forced to acknowledge him a master. Still he stands lonely and isolated. His admirers acclaim him as Beethoven's successor, while the adherents of the ultra modern school look on him as an extraordinary exception, a special case. It is as though Schubert should have been the link which joined Brahms with the rest of the great classics and showed his position in the chain of their achievements. The presence, too, of Schubert's genial nature among the ranks of symphony composers, might have done something to modify the occasional severity of Brahms's style, and so given him his place more readily in the hearts of music-lovers of to-day. This is largely conjecture and may be condemned by some as mere fancy, by others as false on the grounds that no link in the artistic chain can be lost; what one cannot achieve another will, and so the progress of art is unbroken. I am not prepared to take a side in such a discussion, but, returning to the unfinished symphony, I find in it a promise of great things, which neither in Schubert's own work nor in that of any of his successors has been entirely fulfilled. Here, if ever, is an autobiography in music. It is the story of an unfinished life.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

ON October 15 Messrs. Chapman and Hall will commence the issue of their National Edition of Charles Dickens's writings. The edition—which will consist of forty volumes at 10s. 6d. net each—will include upwards of one hundred articles now collected for the first time, and his letters, speeches, plays, and poems, together with Forster's Life. The pictures comprise all the original illustrations, with a complete series of portraits, additional illustrations, facsimiles and reproductions of handwriting, many of which have not been included in any collected edition of the novelist's works. The text is that corrected by Dickens in the last two years of his life, and the additional articles are for the most part contributions to Household Words, which, the publishers tell us, "have been identified for the first time by indisputable evidence." In regard to the choice of illustrations, the publishers' plan has been to include only those which were drawn for their editions during Dickens's lifetime. The additional character-portraits by Phiz, Frank Stone, A.R.A., and others, as well as the frontispieces especially drawn for the first cheap edition, and a number of interesting title-pages, vignettes, and designs for the decoration of the different early editions are also reproduced, together with a complete set of the original wrappers, and of the covers to the "People's" Edition, printed on paper of the same colour and quality as the originals. The whole edition will be completed in eighteen months, and will be issued at the rate of two volumes a month, with one or two exceptions, when three volumes will be issued together.

Mr. George Allen will publish in October "Sir Thomas Lawrence's Letter-Bag," edited by Mr. George Somes Layard. "Sir Thomas Lawrence's Letter-bag" is chiefly composed of selections from the hitherto unpublished letters of the artist and his friends: letters from Peel, Wellington, Scott, Cowper, Thomas Campbell, Miss Farren, afterwards Countess of Derby, Lady Caroline Lamb, William Godwin, Canova, Mrs. Siddons, Lord Castlereagh, J. W. Croker, Elizabeth Duchess of Devonshire, Lord Ellenborough, Etty, B. R. Haydon, Jekyll, Mrs. Jordan, the Kembles, Metternich, and almost every prominent person living at the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century, and some hundreds of Lawrence's own letters, copies of which he made and kept. In addition to these, the book will contain Miss Elizabeth Croft's interesting recollections of the painter, covering a period of thirty years. It will be illustrated with reproductions of various portraits painted by Lawrence.

One of the most important of Messrs. Constable's autumn announcements is the "Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn," to be issued in two volumes. Born in the Ionian Islands, of Greek and Irish parentage, with an added strain of gypsy blood, Lafcadio Hearn was all his life a wanderer. He lived at various times with a wealthy aunt in Wales, in the ascetic atmosphere of a Roman Catholic College, in extreme poverty on the east side of New York, in bohemian literary circles in Cincinnati and New Orleans, in many parts of the American tropics, and finally, during the fourteen years before his death, in Japan. His biographer, Mrs. Wetmore, enjoyed Hearn's friendship for nearly thirty years, and had the advantage of seeing him in many different environments. The bulk of the book will consist of his letters to various correspondents, covering a period of thirty-five years, and will contain also some fragments of an autobiography, begun before his death, which brings the story of his life down to the point at which the correspondence begins. The volumes will be illustrated with portraits and reproductions of the pen-and-ink sketches with which he was wont to embellish his letters.

Mr. Arthur Symons has completed a new anthology upon which he has been engaged for some time past, and the volume, which is to be entitled "A Pageant of Elizabethan Poetry," will be published shortly by Messrs. Blackie and Son. The range of the selection is exceptionally wide, the limits being Spenser and Herrick, Mr. Symons's arrangement is not chronological but according to subject, the poems following one another "like the characters in a great pageant."

Mr. A. H. Bullen announces for immediate publication a volume of "Poems, 1899-1905" of W. B. Yeats, which contains the plays The Shadowy Waters, The King's Threshold, and On Baile's Strand, entirely revised and largely re-written, and the collection of lyrics "In the Seven Woods." Mr. Bullen will also publish shortly a monograph on Thomas Stothard, R.A., illustrated with examples of his designs and book-illustrations. It has been written by the late Mr. A. C. Coxhead, and consists of a full biography of the artist, and a catalogue raisonné of his work. The play Prunella, or Love in a Dutch Garden, by Laurence Housman and Granville Barker, which was so successfully revived this summer at the Court Theatre, will be issued in book-form by the same publisher. It will contain a frontispiece designed by Mr. Laurence Housman and cut on wood by Miss Housman. The third series of "Popular Ballads of the Olden Time" edited by Frank Sidgwick is promised in the autumn. This volume will consist chiefly of Scottish ballads of the Border, and will include many fine ballads not previously published in a popular form. An original feature will be a map of the Border country, showing as many of the localities mentioned in these ballads as can now be identified with any degree of certainty. Mr. Bullen will be the publisher.

Messrs. Macmillan will publish this autumn a work on "English Literature from the Norman Conquest to Chaucer," by Dr. William Henry Schofield, Professor of Comparative Literature in Harvard University. It is the first of two volumes on the Literary History of England from the Norman Conquest to Elizabeth which have been planned to complete the series to which Mr. Stopford Brooke, Professor Saintsbury, and Mr. Gosse have already contributed. It covers particularly the period down to the time of Chaucer, but deals also with such other works (romances, tales, legends, etc.) as are written in early mediæval styles. Messrs. Macmillan hope to publish about the same time the fifth and concluding volume of Mr. Herbert Paul's "History of Modern England," which covers the decade 1885 to 1895.

We should have imagined that any demand for Trollope's writings had been met by Mr. Lane's reprints in the "Pocket Classics"; but Messrs. Bell, we learn, have yet another edition of the Barsetshire novels in the press. The first volume, "The Warden," will be issued next month with an introduction by Mr. Frederic Harrison.

A new volume by Mr. W. R. H. Trowbridge will be published by Mr. Unwin on September 3. It is entitled "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall—Historiettes of the Restoration," and contains biographical studies of eight famous women of the period: Hortense Mancini, Duchesse de Mazarin; Barbara Villiers, Duchess of Cleveland; "La Belle Stuart," Duchess of Richmond; "La Belle Hamilton," Comtesse de Gramont; "The Lovely Jennings," Duchess of Tyrconnel; Anna Maria, Countess of Shrewsbury; "Madame," Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans; and Louise de Keroual, Duchess of Portsmouth. On the same day Mr. Unwin will publish a work on "The Psychology of Child Development," by Mr. Irving King, Fellow in Philosophy in the University of Chicago, and instructor in Psychology and History of Education in Pratt Institute. The aim of the book is to present a consistent and intelligible outline of the development of the child from the standpoint of mental function.

Messrs. Macmillan will begin this month the publication, in fortnightly volumes, of a new pocket edition of the works of Mr. Thomas Hardy. "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" will be the first. The books are printed on India paper, and are bound in both cloth and leather. In general appearance they resemble Messrs. Macmillan's pocket editions of Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray. The same publishers will issue, on the fourteenth of the month, Mr. H. G. Wells's new novel, "In the Days of the Comet."

A work on "The Old Cornish Drama" by Mr. Thurston C. Peter will be published shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. It will show the divergences in text and tone between the Cornish and other Morality Plays, and give a special illustration from the unique play relating to the Life of St. Meriadoc into which are interwoven many Cornish legends. A notable instance of the development of some of the legends is given in that of St. George, where St. George and Henry V. are contemporaries and the latter is represented as taking Quebec.

A volume of collected papers of the late Henry Gray Graham, whose "Social Life of Scotland in the Eighteenth Century," is being re-issued in a cheap form, is now in preparation. It is to be prefaced by a short memoir by his son.

Mr. W. D. Howells has in the press a volume entitled "Certain Beautiful English Cities." Bath, Bristol, Canterbury, Exeter, Oxford and Wells are numbered among his "beautiful cities."

Messrs. Ginn and Company will shortly publish "Mountain Wild Flowers of America" a new work by Julia W. Henshaw. The book will be illustrated with one hundred full-page illustrations from the original photographs taken by the author in the mountain regions.

A French journalist recently complained to Tolstoy, that the American people were devoid of ideals, and devoted only to the passion of money-getting. Professor Brander Matthews, in an address given before two colleges, set himself to answer these and other sweeping charges made by foreign critics. His address is now being brought out under the title of "American Character," by Messrs. Crowell.

Mr. John Long will publish during this month the following Six-Shilling Novels: "The Portals of Love," by Violet Tweedale; "A Beggar on Horseback," by S. R. Keightley; "The Girls of Inverbarns," by Sarah Tytler; "The Ingenious Captain Cobbs," by G. W. Appleton; "The Horse and the Maid," by Arthur Cowden; and "Leone," by Lady Dunbar of Mochrum.

CORRESPONDENCE

SPELLING REFORM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—If earth-life, or that part of it which we call English, has but a few hundred years to run (and I see by the Times that Islam threatens to swallow us up quick) then we need not trouble to change our spelling; but the notion that the English people will go on for ever with their present "orthography" as we call it, is ridiculous. The sooner it is reformed the better will be the result; and those who most value our literature should be the most anxious to promote a movement which, well-conducted, may yet be conservative, but if opposed and deferred will be most probably revolutionary, and almost cut tradition away.

If Professor Skeat's opinion is of weight, it must be held entirely to invalidate the quasi-scientific objection of genteel persons who stickle for the history of the language. The history of the language is in its sound, not in its misspellings; and it is possible that such a recognised etymological authority as Professor Skeat, speaking also with the authority of the British Academy, may serve to overrule the plausible squeamishness of our half-educated classes. But how can any reform be instituted?

I have for some time urged what I consider the only practical plan: and that is for the editors of newspapers, journals, and weeklies to form a committee who should decide to enforce a gradual change. If in all their printing offices there was a simultaneous weekly, or fortnightly, or even monthly order that in future certain words should be spelt in a certain way, the changes (if wisely chosen) would not really incommode or retard their producing business, and the interest which intelligent hands would take in the matter, would secure their attention and collaboration; nor would the public be offended or puzzled.

Let the first order, for instance, be to omit all the final mute es from words ending with short ive, so that we should have give for give, and effective for effective: as soon as this order was carried out, and had fallen into routine (which I think it would by the second printing), then, and not before, let another equally needed and sensible order be appended to the first.

In two or three years the spelling of the language would have been sufficiently perfected on trial for a full scheme to be introduced by authority. But I think myself that the test of practical convenience, and the gradual introduction of change are all important.

ROBERT BRIDGES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Greevz Fysher takes a very sensible view of the question of spelling by pleading for liberty. At present much tyranny and cruelty is exercised in teaching and in maintaining the orthodox fashion of spelling. As an instance of the stupidity and hide-bound mind of some people regarding spelling, may I relate the following which took place a few years ago:—A clerk left with the Paymaster-General directions for the sale of about £1600 of Consols, which were to be sold on the following Tuesday. On Monday morning his firm received a letter to call at the Paymaster's office with respect to the sale. On calling, the clerk was informed that the order directing the sale did not accurately describe the account as it stood in the Paymaster's books; the error consisted in spelling honourable without the "u"!

To carry out the Paymaster's wishes the order had to pass through four departments, and the sale was delayed a week!

Well might Professor Earle ask in the Times a few years ago: "Who is benefited by rigor in spelling? It would be hard to find any material more unprofitable or less educational than spelling, for young men to exercise their minds upon during the most receptive time of life. Is it that in the offices where these young men may have to write, a uniform spelling is of such supreme importance? Let us suppose any probable amount of diversions which might result from an entire omission of orthography in examinations. What harm could it do? Could it make any opening for substantial mistakes in the conduct of business? The meaning of words is determined on every occasion, not by orthography, but by their combinations and their place in the context. The process of compelling a uniform orthography is, in fact, a strife against nature."

Is it not singular that the men who know more about and are most interested in orthography, are the men who care little about our current spelling? Nearly every philologist of note in England and America is in favor of its being modified, in the interests of education and filology.

It is with a view to lessen the "strife against nature" that the Simplified Spelling Board is seeking to introduce modifications. The School Authorities of New York are about to second the Board's efforts, acting in accordance with your Note on page 51, by adopting in their primer the 300 word-forms recommended by the Board.

A further advance in the Board's work is reported to me by Dr. C. P. G. Scott. That Prof. Skeat, Prof. Joseph Wright and Dr. Bradley have been elected members of the Board, and have accepted. Dr. Murray and Dr. Sweet have declined, on plea of other work. The Board is willing to supply literature, free on application, at 1 Madison Avenue, New York.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—One is accustomed to receive outrageous and incredible news from the United States, the land of the "Yankees"; but the latest intelligence emanating from that part of the world really "takes the cake." We are told that a certain Professor Brander Matthews, together with Mr. Andrew Carnegie, "Mark Twain" (who ought to know better), and other men of supposed prominence, have formed a so-called "Spelling Reform Committee," which proposes to revolutionize the spelling of the English language, thus altering the orthography of hundreds and hundreds of words, like the following: confest (instead of confessed); washt (instead of washed); profest (instead of professed); thru (instead of through); thoroly (instead of thoroughly); and so on. It is not very surprising to learn that this abject tomfoolery has received the "official sanction" of the accidental and temporary American President with a Dutch name, Theodore Roosevelt, a man who is ever to the fore with some wild-goose scheme or other. The American people have already gone far to spoil our noble language, for they invariably take upon themselves to spell such words as traveller, rebellious, and marvellous with a single l, which looks absolutely hideous to English eyes. From a mushroom country like the United States we English are hardly likely to tolerate instructions in the matter of spelling, and the British nation will laugh this latest piece of impertinence on the part of the Americans contemptuously out of court.

"LIKE" AS A CONJUNCTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is holiday time; and if it amuses Professor Tyrrell to lark with the functions of "like" and say that he does "not think that like was ever a proposition or any part of speech but an adjective," and that its use as a conjunction is "an atrocity," no one will object to his little joke. But if the matter is to be taken seriously, I ask Professor Tyrrell whether his entire ignorance of the historic use of the word "like" is not the cause of his confident assertions about it. He evidently did not know that Shakespeare and his successors used "like" as a conjunction till I told him they did; he hadn't read Sidney Walker's authoritative paper on it; he had never looked it up in F. S. Ellis's Shelley Concordance or William Morris's prose or the Oxford Dictionary; and yet he didn't hesitate to lay down the law about it as if he had really a right to an opinion on the subject. No doubt the study of Greek does, as Gaisford is reported to have said, enable a man to despise his neighbours, but it really does not make him an authority on English words and phrases.

Let us start with the Psalter's "Like as the hart desireth the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." Here like is an adverb, like just is in "Just as rain wets the cloth, so wind dries it." But the words like as were looked on as a joint conjunction, and when as dropped off, like became a conjunction and produced the instances in Shakespeare, his helper in Pericles, and the other writers, quotations from whom are given by Walker, etc. These quotations show that sentences like the following, in which like is a conjunction, are good English: "He has curly red hair like my brother had as a boy"; "she rides astride her horse, like you and I do, on a man's saddle"; "he led the Hall eight in a wager-boat on the Cam, just like Hanlan used to lead the London eight on the Thames."

Similarly with regard to like as a preposition. The early compound was like-to. In looking through some Lydgate proofs lately I saw only this: by Robert Greene's time the to had dropped off, and like was used alone as a preposition as we use it now: "like him, the audience clapt loudly" (cf., "except him, no one stird"), "she looks and talks like him." In "Menaphon's Eclogue" (Plays and Poems, ed. Collins ii. 257) we find on the same page

Hir lockes are pleighted like the fleece of wooll . . .
Hir cheekes like ripened lillies steeped in wine . . .

Her eyes, faire eyes, like to the purest lights . . .
Her necke like to an yvorie shining tower. . .

On ii. 135 we have

Dor[othea]. How look I, Namo? like a man or no?
Namo. If not a man, yet like a manlie shewe.

And there are lots of similar examples.

Wherever like stands for an earlier like to, it is a preposition, wherever it stands for an earlier like as, it is a conjunction. That is my contention, and that it may be used in both ways still. To call "like I did" "an atrocity," is just Professor Tyrrell's whim, and can only be defended by a plea like Shylock's when he justified his desire for Antonio's pound of flesh.

F. J. FURNIVALL.

"LIKE" (CONJ.)—"REVENUE" (PAROX.)

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May not Drs. Tyrrell and Furnivall be both right and both wrong? An illustration will make my meaning clear. "Absque me foret" is excellent Plautine, but beyond such expressions of this type as Plautus gives we cannot go. So, perhaps, beyond the instances of "like" (conj.) given by authors, Elizabethan or other, we cannot venture without slipping. In the Plautine example all depends probably on the personal pronoun: so in the idioms "per te deos oro," "næ ille. . . ." "Like I did" is probably good, "like St. Louis did" is possibly bad, English.

"REVENUE" (IN TENNYSON).

My father often told me that, when first this word was on all men's lips in Sir R. Peel's time, the accent was on the middle syllable ("révenue"). Later, the accentuation was a moot point.

ARISTOTLE AND THE MODERN READER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There are one or two points in the candid and interesting review of my book in your issue of the 18th inst. under the above heading, on which, if you will kindly allow me, I should like to say a few words.

As to Aristotle's doctrine of the Mean: Your Reviewer misunderstands me if he thinks that I criticise it unfavourably. He refers, no doubt, to my remarks on pp. 132 sqq. But whilst I accept Kant's opinion, that Aristotle makes the difference between Virtue and Vice quantitative, I reject his inference that this is any objection to the doctrine. For the practical purposes which Aristotle had in view it is more useful to be told that good conduct lies between opposite extremes than to learn that it involves matter and form—a material, and a principle in accordance with which that material is moulded; the latter may be the more sympathetic interpretation, but I own to a distrust of sympathetic interpretations, especially in Aristotle. The doctrine of the mean itself is trite enough, being probably one of the earliest generalizations on conduct formulated by mankind, but Aristotle put such popular saws as "nothing too much," "you are safest in the middle" into precise scientific language; he showed that the middle was a relative and variable point whose position was to be fixed by prudence; moreover, he explained the doctrine by showing it to fall under the wider generalizations furnished by physiology and biology. This entitles Aristotle to be called its author and it contrasts strongly with the casual and supercilious references in Plato to moderation as a moral quality. In the passage in the Phædo referred to (82 A-B) the habits of justice and moderation are treated, not as good but as the best of the bad, and the souls of those who possess them are relegated after death to the bodies of bees and wasps, and at a new birth become "moderate men." If this be not contemptuous it is at all events not complimentary.

Aristotle does not commit himself to the Pythagorean conjecture that evil is of the nature of the unlimited (1106, b 29) beyond using it to exemplify his own remark that there are many ways of being wrong but only one way of being right.

As to the Practical Syllogism it is true as your Reviewer says that it does little more than formulate facts. But the facts required to be formulated, or so acute a man as Sokrates would never have maintained that it is only through ignorance that we act against our better judgment. The Sokratic paradox overlooks the truth that Aristotle brings out, that there are competing judgments and that the agent is determined to the one towards which his desires prompt him. And the question is, not whether this explanation goes to the root of things, but whether it is adequate. It seems simple enough when pointed out—but, like Columbus's experiment with the egg, it required some one to show the way, and I still think that Aristotle rendered a great service in doing so.

The Reviewer does not understand my remark that the account of the Practical Syllogism in the seventh book is improperly limited to the single case of certain selected pleasures. He says, "Aristotle with perfect propriety uses ἀκρῆτα in the sense in which everybody else used it. It may be, as Mr. Marshall says, 'not the business of moral philosophers to spoil useful words by giving them a limited and accidental meaning,' but still less is it their business to breed misunderstanding by using common words in unfamiliar senses."

This criticism sacrifices accuracy to epigram, for Aristotle himself tells us that men are familiarly said to be wanting in self-control in respect of anger, honour and gain, as well as in the pleasures to which he would restrict the word (ἐν ἀκρατεῖς λέγονται καὶ θυμοῦ καὶ τιμῆς καὶ κέρδους: 1145, b 19). Even if he had not said so, we might have inferred it from his treatment of the subject, for he would scarcely have taken so much pains to prove the proper sense of the word if there was only one sense in which it was ever used.

The Reviewer does not like my rendering of ἀκρῆτα by "irresolution," nor do I like it, and I should be glad to be helped to a single English word which expresses the state of mind of a man who, owing to the conflict between reason and desire, is not master of himself. The makers of English have not given us half-sizes enough, and it is only writers of authority who can

dower
Their native language with a word
Of power.

Your Reviewer's criticism of my note on p. 146 is quite just; it is very clumsily written and I am glad to have attention called to it.

My observation that the law of the mean is not applied by Aristotle to the case of the senses, as it might well have been, referred of course to the Ethics alone, whose hearers were not supposed to be familiar with the De Anima and, in fact, probably knew nothing about it. Still I think I ought to have referred to the passage to which your Reviewer has directed me.

There are other points, and especially that of natural Justice on which I should have liked to say something, but I must not trespass further on your space. I am sorry not to have the support of so instructed an opinion as that of your Reviewer on the questions on which we differ, but I fear we should never come completely together. He approaches the Ethics from the Platonic side, and I consider that one of Aristotle's main objects in all his principal works, his Ethics, his Logic, Metaphysic, Psychology and Politics was to correct what he thought to be the errors, to supplement the omissions and to express his dissent from the main principles of the philosophy of his great master.

Your Reviewer, like many others, seeks a sympathetic interpretation, and there is something to be said for trying to embrace a wide field in one view. But the defect of such attempts is that they lose in definition what they gain in comprehension; whether it is better to be more clear or more comprehensive is a matter of temperament.

THE FUTURE LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Would a Student of Literature kindly supply the title of Collins's Poem, from which he quoted a line, and also the further information in which edition of Collins's Poems it appears?

CONSTANT READER.

To the Editor of the ACADEMY

SIR,—Your readers may be expected to include not a few who think with Goethe that the future life may be taken for granted and time spent in improving one's self in the present one. So, let me restrict myself to the remark that I think "A Student of Literature" has fairly given away his case by admitting the inconsistency of modern writers in their views of futurity. The inconsistency is easy of explanation, I know. Pagan philosophy and poetry have done more to shape the best of their works than Christian doctrine. But, the ancients were consistent. They had their sceptical ones. So had the schoolmen. Thomas Aquinas proposed twenty-one probable reasons for the immortality of the soul. Scotus refuted them one by one. Successive Christian centuries ought hardly to leave a Cowper saying, "How little we know of a state to which we are all destined. And how does the obscurity that hangs over that undiscovered country increase the anxiety we sometimes feel as we are journeying towards it" (Letter to the Rev. W. Unwin, June 23, 1784); or a Schiller in his little poem, Immortality, asking,

"Are you afraid of Death? Do you long to live for ever? Live then in the whole mass of humanity, and, when you are no more, it will continue."

As for Kant's bases, God and a Future Life, though note that he speaks of them as "hypotheses," they are the corner-stone, and needs must be, of all philosophy. So, to turn our little agreeable passage of arms to the best account, I trust my honourable opponent will let me say that, though we so differently interpret the matter in question betwixt us, I agree with him fully in deeming it of deep interest to all literary students. The following guide therefore to a few works, as interesting as they are fruitful, may, perhaps, render some a service:

(1) The article "La croyance à l'immortalité de l'ame" in Henry Weil's "Études sur l'antiquité grecque."

(2) "Les idées antiques sur la mort et la critique de ces idées par Épicure" and "Le poème de Lucrèce" in vol. i. of E. Caro's "Mélanges et Portraits."

(3) The fifth chapter of Constant Marthe's "Le Poème de Lucrèce."

(4) Cicero's first "Tusculan Disputation."

(5) Histoire des théories et des idées morales, by J. Denis.

(6) Papers of the Spectator, Nos. 210, 537, and 600.

To wind up the whole affair on an amusing note, there is in Bayle's Dictionary, Article Bonfadius, the following story: "Marcilius Ficinus, a priest of Florence, a great platonic philosopher and a great divine, died, and immediately his ghost, in the form of a cavalier clothed in white, mounted on a horse of the same colour, ran full speed to the door of Michael Mercatus, who was his intimate friend and likewise a great platonic philosopher, who was then studying by break of day in his closet, in a town at a good distance from Florence, and cried to him that the discourses which they had together concerning the life to come, were true; and, having said this, ran away towards the place whence it came, and quickly escaped its friend's sigh who called to him to stay for him. This happened by reason of the agreements made between them that he who died first should come to tell the survivor whether things passed in the other life as Plato had written in his book of the Immortality of the Soul." "It was a pity," says Bayle in that piquant way of his, "that Mercatus did not leave a juridical attestation on oath, and registered in the archives of Florence." Canus Julius, whom Caligula put to death and who designed, as he was dying, to observe well whether his soul would perceive its going out (as Montaigne tried to do when thrown off his horse, but he did not die, but only became a while unconscious), promised if he learned anything he would come and see his friends to declare his state to them. Seneca, who tells us this, do n't say whether any news was heard from Julius in consequence of this promise.

I might remark that compared with the number of books which exist of modern writers and the very few that have survived of those of the ancients, passages relative to a future life might well be more frequently met with in the former than in the latter. Add to this that when a thing has been repeatedly said it naturally comes to be said with more emphasis; but, for all that, I do not see any overwhelming evidence of Christianity having made the ideas of a future life more assured or more definite in modern than in ancient classic writings. As to whether Pindar or Milton shall take first place as painters of an ideal state of future bliss, let us enjoy both. Thanking you for so kindly finding room for my previous letters, and hoping the same privilege for this,

R.S.Y.

THE SWEET MIRACLE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the notice of Mr. Prestage's translation of the Sweet Miracle which appears in your issue of to-day Mr. Mosher's name is given as that of the Publisher. This exquisite version was published by my firm in 1903 and is now in its third edition. I must be allowed to express my surprise and regret that a paper of your standing should give any countenance to the publications of Mr. Mosher.

POETRY A SUPPORT AND A SOLACE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In an interesting review of Mrs. Chesson's (Nora Hopper's) poems in the current ACADEMY the writer states that there are, roughly speaking, two kinds of poetry. One kind is a support, a staff to help us on the journey of life. The other is a place of refreshing and a solace to the weary traveller. Readers of the ACADEMY will surely appreciate this illuminating criticism. Your contributor has afforded us a test by which we may judge all poetry that comes under our notice. We take up a volume of poems and sit down to read. We are in the mood to appreciate and admire, if anything is presented to us that will call forth such feelings. We read from cover to cover, but find nothing which is calculated either to solace us in a weary hour or to strengthen us to bear up against the ills of life. If this is so, we may well in future leave the book alone; for us, at any rate, it is worthless. We have applied our test, and judged by our standard the book is a failure. We need not, however, be discouraged. There are many volumes of modern verse which will free us from the cares of life, by opening to our view the land of faery, and so doing, they will soothe and refresh us. Such poetry may not, perhaps, be great poetry, but it is certainly a valuable possession for all who bear the burden and heat of the day. There is another class of poetry. It is rarer than that just referred to. This kind helps us to live our lives more nobly, by being, at once, an inspiration and a source of strength. It is of the utmost value, and will take rank as great poetry, provided that the poet is an artist, and can clothe his thoughts in verse as melodious as it is helpful.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am ill-read or not read at all in the criticism on Shakespeare's Sonnets, so that I do not know if the following suggestion has been made before. If not, you may think it worth printing. It is, that the sonnets were written on commission for somebody else and in that individual's person. Shakespeare would have been paid a few pounds for the work, and this would explain why he never sought to publish them. Writing for him was a means of livelihood, and he seems to have been rather anxious for the time when he should have enough to retire and write no more immortal master-pieces. He cared no more about fame than a Brahman saint cares about caste—he was above it all. Is it likely that he wrote the sonnets without being paid for them?

A DIGEST OF THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I notice in your issue of the 11th inst. a review of my Digest of the Law of Copyright. The foolishness of a criticism which complains of my attempt to state the law when there is no decision precisely in point is obvious, but of that I do not complain because I have no doubt that it is fair in the legal sense of the word. I do complain however when you make an erroneous statement of fact which to my mind could not have been made by any careful reviewer. You say "He starts off for instance with a definition of 'literary work' for which there is no authority, and ignores that of 'book' which is determined by the Copyright Act, 1842. This is not the fact. 'Literary work' and 'book' are both defined in my digest in their proper places, the former on Page 1 where unpublished works are dealt with, the latter on Page 9 when published works are dealt with. My definition of 'book' moreover is verbatim in the words of the Copyright Act, 1842.

I cannot think how anybody could read my "pamphlet" with any degree of care and then say that I ignore the statutory definition of "book." A review which contains such an erroneous statement is clearly libellous, and very damaging when it appears in a paper with the reputation which the ACADEMY enjoys.

E. J. MACGILLIVRAY.

August 26.

[Mr. MacGillivray is perfectly correct in stating that on p. 9 of his digest he gives a definition of "book," and that that definition is verbatim in the words of the Copyright Act, 1842, which is printed in full in his Appendix. The sentence in our notice of which he complains is, we admit, somewhat obscurely expressed: it should have read: "having given the statutory definition of 'book' which is determined by the Copyright Act, 1842, he afterwards tends to ignore it, in favour of his definition of 'literary work,' for which definition there is no authority in the Statute Book."—ED.]

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

The DAILY TELEGRAPH says :

"With the ever-widening interest in art fostered by modern methods of reproduction, such books as these, giving a kind of bound portfolio of representative works of the great masters, prefaced by brief introductions written by competent critics, should prove acceptable to a large number of people. The books are strongly bound, as picture-books should be, and are designed with tasteful simplicity."

Newnes' Art Library

Small crown 4to. Quarter vellum. 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d. each.

THE object of this series is to illustrate by adequate reproductions the Paintings, Drawings, and Sculpture of the Great Masters. To this end the illustrations are all full-page, finely printed upon one side only of the paper. Special care is being taken in every detail of the production that the result may be worthy of its great subject. Each volume contains from 56 to 64 full-page plates. In addition there is a Frontispiece in photogravure or two illustrations in colours. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced.

THE ANNALS OF COVENT GARDEN THEATRE, 1732-1897.

By HENRY SAXE WYNDHAM.

With 45 Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

In writing the history of Covent Garden, the author has had to pass under review a host of extraordinary people. There are few figures in theatrical or any other history, that are more eccentric than was that of JOHN RICH, the founder of the theatre; JOHN BEARD, GEORGE COLMAN, JOHN and CHARLES KEMBLE, MACREADY, CHARLES MATHEWS and MADAME VESTRIS are all striking personalities, and their history might almost be called a romance. The author has striven to omit nothing that is of importance in the century and three quarters over which the history of the theatre extends. Stories of the two fires, the O.P. riots, the first nights of The Riva's, She Stoops to Conquer, The Lady of Lyons, London Assurance, etc., and other famous events are also told.

The Binding and Title are Copies of XV. and XIII. Century Originals.

THE LITERARY WEEK

It is more than fifty years ago since Lord Amherst began to form the famous collection of books of which he now intends to sell the "plums." He began more than ten years before the Eshton Hall sale (1862) of the collection of Miss Richardson Currer, which has been described as "a good all-round English library." The famous Tite sale (1874), which included Sir William Tite's Caxtons, was another of his earlier appearances as a book-buyer "to be reckoned with"; and then in the 'eighties—that golden decade for book-collectors—he was a purchaser at the seven famous sales of the period: the Sunderland or Blenheim sale (1881–1883), the Bedford and Hamilton Palace sale (1882–1884), the Syston Park (Sir J. Thorold's) sale (1884), the sale of Lord Jersey's books from Osterley Park (1885), the Fuller Russell sale in the same year, which was remarkable for its Caxtons, the Woodhull sale in 1886, and finally the sale of Lord Crawford's books in 1887 and 1889, where Lord Amherst acquired a good many of his unique and priceless Bibles.

Since then there have been the Ashburnham sale (1897–98) with the sale of the manuscripts in 1901, and the Mackellar sale in 1898, when again Lord Amherst added to his theological library. At all these—and at Mr. Quaritch's where more important transactions go on even than sales by auction—Lord Amherst was an envied—and a pre-American—buyer. And now, for reasons into which we need not enter but which have aroused the sympathy of all good men and book-lovers, he finds himself advised to sell the best things in his library. Those best things—the "plums"—are, we are informed on the best authority, the Caxtons. There are seventeen of them. That sounds a small number. Eleven of these are perfect. That sounds smaller still.

Now, Caxton printed something over one hundred books. Of these only thirty-eight exist in single copies or in fragments; and the whole number of Caxtons in existence is estimated by Mr. Quaritch—roughly, for until Mr. Gordon Duff's Census of Caxtons is complete and published only Mr. Gordon Duff knows the exact numbers—at nearly six hundred. But when we come to complete copies, the story is very different. It is in the eleven complete copies that the unique strength of Lord Amherst's Collection consists.

What will become of them? It would be possible at the expense of no small time and trouble to trace the fate of the books dispersed from the famous libraries we have mentioned; but it appears to be the case that, ever since the Sunderland sale, the first in which America took an interest, America, not England, has secured the best of what was to be had. Just at present the New York Public Library—to take a single instance—is preparing a new building, in which will be housed the Lennox Collections and the Astor Collection, to say nothing of many other sources; and New York is henceforth a city that must absolutely be visited in certain circumstances by real scholars who are content with nothing less than the unique original. Mr. Pierpont Morgan, again, who bought the Bennett Collection, is the owner of not less than thirty Caxtons. And England, so we are informed by the highest authority, is not keeping her place in the ranks of the book-collectors.

A suggestion originating with Mr. Quaritch is that the Amherst books should pass to Canada, where pictures have for some time been eagerly acquired, while books remained comparatively neglected. The idea is a good one. There are money, enthusiasm and taste in Canada, which might well be expended on the Amherst library. But the inhabitant of the old country will hope—selfishly perhaps, but inevitably—that certain things may remain in the island. Who could part—even to Canada—with a book bound with the very hand of Mary Ferrar of Little Gidding? Thomas Wotton, again, is a name too little known, but one that all acquainted with book-binding must venerate, and the volumes that belonged to the English sovereigns, Henry VII., Edward VI., Henry VIII., and Charles I., have associations that link them inseparably to the mother country.

We could, an if we would, give our readers—thanks to the courtesy of Mr. Quaritch—some particulars of the manner in which the delicate work of transporting the books from Didlington to London will be managed. But that would be like telling Captain Swift when the gold-convoy would reach Blue Gulch.

There is a touch of pathos in the letter with which Professor Skeat takes farewell of a holiday in the northern capital and of those who have differed from him in the matter of spelling reform. "I find that times have changed," he writes to the Scotsman on August 31, "since the days when the University of Edinburgh honoured me with the degree of LL.D. for my services to English literature, and to Scottish literature in particular. Just because I know enough of the history of spelling, as regards our language, from the year 750 to the present day, to have the grace to perceive that our present spelling leaves much to be desired, I am treated to ignoble attacks . . . I leave (with what regret!) this beautiful city of Edinburgh to-day, and expect to see no more Scotch newspapers for many days to come. Those who find their pleasure in abusing me can do so to their heart's content; I shall not know what they say."

If threatened structures, like threatened men, live long, then there is a fair hope for the survival of the Auld Brig of Ayr. £10,000 will have to be forthcoming if the Brig is to be preserved. The Town Council of Ayr, realising that so large an amount of money is not to be had all in a moment, has granted the Voluntary Committee, which has taken the matter in hand, an extension of time for the development of the scheme for raising the sum required. On or before October 1 the Committee is to call a public meeting and give an account of its procedure. Meanwhile it is announced, on the Committee's behalf, that subscriptions will be received and acknowledged by Mr. W. J. Pollock, Bank of Scotland, Ayr. Now is the time, evidently, for admirers of Burns to loose their purse-strings.

The death of the grandson of a poet of European fame must not be passed over in silence. Ralph Gordon Noel Milbanke, Earl of Lovelace, who died at Ockham on August 28, was Byron's grandson, his mother having been the poet's only legitimate child. It is with an invocation to her that one of the cantos of "Childe Harold" begins:

Is thy face like thy mother's, my fair child,
Ada, sole daughter of my house and heart?

She died in 1852, after seventeen years of married life. And now her son has passed away, eighty-two years after his grandfather's death at Missolonghi.

"There are few associations whose work is of more value to this country, for its labours mould and shape the destinies of all classes of people, old and young, rich and poor. Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress,' Defoe's 'Robinson Crusoe,' Baxter's 'Saints' Rest,' Paley's 'Evidences,' Fox's 'Martyrs,' and some ancient sermons, mitigated occasionally by Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy,' Bailey's 'Dictionary,' and a few other gentle stimulants, were all the literature the working classes of the manufacturing and agricultural districts possessed at the commencement of the reign of Queen Victoria," said Sir William H. Bailey, the President of the Library Association, at the twenty-ninth Conference which took place at Bradford this week. And he went on to say that at the present time the Libraries Acts have been adopted in two hundred and three cities and boroughs which control about six hundred libraries, containing over five million books, and used last year by fifty million readers.

Sir William Bailey was of opinion that the Forney Libraries of Industrial Art, carried on under municipal control in the working-class districts of Paris, might well be imitated in this country. The special aim is to keep on the shelves all material of interest to the particular trade of the district. Patterns, prints, drawings and photographs, as well as books, are freely lent to workmen; models and illustrations may be copied in the building; and facilities are provided for drawing and photographing. He dwelt also on the advance in co-operative cataloguing in England and abroad, instancing the co-operative catalogue of all the books on architecture in the Manchester and Salford Public Libraries and the Libraries of all the learned societies and seats of learning of the City and Borough; and other papers contributed were "Book-binding" by Dr. J. Gordon Parker (Herold's Institute, Bermondsey), and the Relation of Public Libraries to the present System of Education by Mr. Roberts (Bradford), who urged that committees should have the power to organise lectures and to formulate a new system of evening continuation school, both of which should be the means of earning grants from the Board of Education. The exhibition of the best books of 1905-6 was perhaps the finest that has yet been shown in connection with the Library Association. A complete list of the best books is published by the Library Supply Company.

It is interesting to know from a letter that Mr. A. Steel has written to the Times that there is at least one man still living who has seen Sir Walter Scott in the flesh. We should imagine that this is almost a solitary survival, although it is true that until within a few years ago there were several persons living who remembered the appearance of the "Wizard." The present writer knew two or three of them, but the picture they had carried away was a pathetic one. They remembered Scott in his later days as a man prematurely old with scanty grey hair, a white, pained-looking face, and an infirmity in one of his legs.

Mr. Steel tells us besides that Mr. Lundy, the man who had seen Scott, also has quite a vivid remembrance of Edward Irving, the founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church and one of the most interesting men of his time. He says that he received Irving's blessing, and this is quite in accordance with what we know of the later years of Irving's life, during which, when he entered a house, his first salutation was: "Peace be to this house." Some said that he had partially lost his reason, and perhaps that was a fair inference to be drawn from the well-known remark of Mrs. Carlyle: "There would have been no tongues if Irving had married me."

There may be doubts in some quarters as to whether or not Carlyle is holding his own—some of his disciples are assured that, if at present his fame is partially eclipsed his day will return—but one thing at any rate is certain, that, year after year, visitors from every region of the globe find their way to the Carlyle shrines at Chelsea and Ecclefechan. During the twelvemonths ending August 24, Cheyne Row, has had as many callers as in any corresponding period since the house was publicly opened, and there has been a larger number of Americans than usual. Arch House, Ecclefechan, in which Thomas Carlyle was born, has been open to the public for a quarter of a century and for a long time past some one thousand three hundred strangers have each year found their way to the Dumfriesshire village. The latest addition to both houses—and the Carlyle relics are more numerous in the London house than in his birthplace—is a large framed photogravure of Whistler's famous portrait, the property of the corporation of Glasgow; but the lettering on the tombstone of the Chelsea Sage, the centre one of three, is somewhat dimmed, from the circumstance that, unlike the two others, the stone, by Carlyle's express desire, is plain and its face letters unpainted. It may not be known, by the way, that Ecclefechan kirkyard holds the dust of an ancestor of Sir Robert Peel. On a time-weathered stone not many yards from the tomb of the Carlyle family there can be read: "Here lyes Robert Peel, who died Aprile ye 2nd, 1749, aged 57." Though a break of the northward journey is necessitated at Carlisle, one is amply repaid in "turning aside" to Ecclefechan.

We have received so many inquiries about the design by Aubrey Beardsley which appears on the cover of Mrs. Craigie's posthumous novel "The Dream and the Business," that we imagine it may interest others besides the inquirers to know the story of it. The design was seen by Mr. Fisher Unwin in black and white at the New English Art Club some years ago; and it was he who suggested to Beardsley to re-draw it in colours. The coloured design was used as a poster to advertise "The Pseudonym Library," in which "John Oliver Hobbes" published her first four stories, "Some Emotions and a Moral." Its employment on the cover of the last work has, therefore, a pathetic interest. Mr. Unwin is the owner of both the originals and of the copyright.

There seems to be every prospect that the Autumn art sales will atone in interest for the dulness of the past year. A Holy Family by Murillo, long lost sight of, has been re-discovered in Constantinople, and the curator of the Louvre after examining the canvas is stated not only to have estimated the value at £40,000 but also to have intimated that France is willing to negotiate for its purchase. The owner, however, thinks he can do better in London whither he is bringing the picture. Of still greater importance is the announcement from Vienna that Prince Klemens, guardian for the minor who is head of the Metternich-Winneburg family, has decided to sell the bulk of the family's art treasures, which include examples of Rembrandt, Rubens, Vandyck, Holbein and Dürer. The collection is valued at £300,000.

Next week we hope to add a new feature to the ACADEMY under the title of Nugae Scriptiores. It will consist of the musings and world-wide observations of one who as scholar, traveller and writer has long occupied a foremost place in literature.

With our next number will be published a special Education Supplement. In addition to reviews of all the recent school-books, it will contain authoritative articles on all the most pressing education problems of the hour.

LITERATURE

MR. CHESTERTON'S "DICKENS"

Charles Dickens. By G. K. CHESTERTON. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

IN this book it is to be feared that Mr. Chesterton has given us an object-lesson to show the very worst manner of writing a biography. In one of his final chapters he unconsciously touches his own weakness, when he declares that all criticism tends too much to become criticism of criticism. The phrase "criticism of criticism" would apply to some nine-tenths of the volume before us, and we cannot help thinking the fact very condemnatory. What we have a right to expect from a biographer is that he will first of all form an intelligible conception of the character he is going to study, and in the second place body it forth with all the skill and lucidity of which he is capable. He is in the position of a sculptor who is asked to make a new statue of a great man. Suppose that before beginning to use his chisel he looked over all the other available statues and came to the conclusion that each had its own faults. In this the poise of the head was wrong, in that the figure was misshapen. This survey may be a necessary preliminary before he begins to mould the clay in accordance with his own idea. In the end, the criterion of his success would not lie in the truthfulness or the falseness of his criticism of other artists, but in the beauty and fidelity of his own statue. In other words, the biographer is himself a creator. It would be unreasonable to expect that the figure he disentangled out of the past would commend itself to every other mind as the indisputable and inevitable personage who once had walked about. No reasonable reader would expect that either from Mr. Chesterton or from any one else. But to scatter abuse on the various writers who have tried to picture Dickens is no substitute for the quiet and self-effacing work of the artist intent on reproducing his own conception. Furthermore, it seems to us that Mr. Chesterton has failed in the fulfilment of his own aim. The effect produced by his book is strikingly akin to that which often follows the mouthing of some one who does not understand what he is talking about and yet unconsciously throws out to the listener hints that lead to a conclusion the talker never dreamed of. Mr. Chesterton is very much addicted to superlatives. "Dickens as the super-man," "the godlike in Dickens," and other expressions of the same order seem to show that he was begging language to express his idolatry. A biographer possessed at once of greater power and greater modesty would have gone to work in a less ostentatious manner.

We are the more sorry to say this because the biographer affords plenty of evidence that he possesses cleverness of a sort. He has even glimmerings of thought, though his survey never reaches to the far horizons. A sort of keynote to the book is that Dickens and his great contemporaries, especially Carlyle, were children of the French Revolution. It does not seem to have dawned on him that there is another theory that is quite as plausible. It is that after a great war it very often happens that a period of striking intellectual activity follows. After all, the man who is most likely to stand out as the greatest figure of the nineteenth century is Charles Darwin, and if one of Mr. Chesterton's tests of greatness be applied the title cannot be withheld. He says on page 296 that the fact of Dickens having done something universal "is attested by the fact that he and Byron are the men who, like pinnacles, strike the eye of the continent." But surely Charles Darwin has exercised an influence on the continent compared with which that of either Dickens or Byron is immeasurably small. Darwin's work, at all events, owed nothing to the French Revolution. The theory to which we have alluded is that during a great war a nation, as a rule, is excited and stimulated, and after the war is over it often happens that a generation of unusual intellectual activity follows. The battle of Waterloo was fought in 1815, and by the time of Queen Victoria's accession to the throne the great men of her era had all produced some of their best or at least their most promising work. Carlyle had been writing his French Revolution, Tennyson some of his most enduring verse, Darwin was working at the task which was to result in "The Descent of Man," Gladstone and Disraeli were towering above the common herd of politicians, and even on the lines of mechanical invention and its application to life we find the same extraordinary activity prevalent. We do not say absolutely that this was all due to a reaction after the war, but the theory that it was holds water just as well as Mr. Chesterton's theory that it was an after-effect of the French Revolution. And a close study of Mr. Chesterton's own work would go far to prove our thesis, for he recognises that Dickens himself was a man of very great ignorance about the past. His ideas about mediæval England were simply grotesque, nor did his genius ever rise to a survey of the long pageant of human life. As Mr. Chesterton says, his figures were nearly all static. He looked into the London crowd with that "face of steel" which Mrs. Carlyle described in a sentence, and with absolute sureness of vision he picked out from it what was amusing and what was pathetic, what had tragedy and, to some extent, what had poetry. That was undoubtedly where his pre-eminence lay, and a fine contrast might be drawn in that respect between him and his model and exemplar, Henry Fielding. The latter was a scholar and an aristocrat, with a sense of humour at least as acute as that of Dickens or any one who has ever written in the English language, but he was able to sit apart and view the procession with twinkling eyes as the spectator without a personal interest in the figures that went by. In that way he became the master of long perspectives, whereas Dickens saw only the crowd beside him and cared nothing for the reasons that brought it together or for the object that it had in view. "I shall pass this way but once," says an old religious writer; and who ever realises that fact on behalf, not only of himself, but of his fellow men, will get an understanding of a pathos and a poetry of life which rather escaped Dickens. It comes to this, then, that taken as a whole Mr. Chesterton's Life is a failure, yet in parts it is both clever and suggestive. Take this for example, concerning "Pickwick":

But the strange and stirring discovery which Dickens made was this—that having chosen a fat old man of the middle classes as a good thing of which to make a butt, he found that a fat old man of the middle classes is the very best thing of which to make a romantic adventurer. "Pickwick" is supremely original in that it is the adventures of an old man. It is a fairy tale in which the victor is not the youngest of three brothers, but one of the oldest of their uncles. The result is both noble and new and true.

We feel somewhat sorry, all the same, that Mr. Chesterton should use the words "noble," "true," and "god-like" so frequently. They are splendid words, and it is a pity that they should be hacked out of the freshness of their meaning. But we are afraid he has not the born writer's reverence for words, or he would avoid such expressions as "a weird contradiction." What he means by "weird" here it is very difficult to guess. So, too, it would have been better if he had abated the terrific diction which he applies to our old friends Sam Weller, Dick Swiveller, and Sairey Gamp. Sam would have been very much astonished to hear himself described by a "livery gent" as a wit, a diplomatist, and a great philosopher. Dick Swiveller, however, would have been delighted to know that the same authority considers his creation to be poetry. The style in which the book is written reminds us too closely of the smart political leader. It abounds in epigram and about once in a thousand times the epigram is really witty. It is very difficult to give a fair idea of Mr. Chesterton's style by means of extract or reference, but any one who will turn to page 107 of the book will find a good specimen of it, in the paragraph beginning with the statement that the power of Dickens lay in the fact "that he expressed with an energy and brilliancy quite uncommon the things close to the common mind:" whereupon our author goes off into an excursus upon the common mind and we are treated to a dissertation, in the course of which the information is vouchsafed that Plato had the common mind, and Dante had the common mind, and that "in everybody there is a certain thing that loves babies, that fears death, that likes sunlight," while "everybody," we are told, means Mrs. Meynell. This leads on, naturally or otherwise, to a discussion on humour and horror; and so, to be quite frank, we drift slowly and quietly into a thick fog where words seem to have lost their meaning and all the usual landmarks and signs are obliterated. William Le Queux and Napoleon Bonaparte, the Duke of Wellington and Mr. Thomas Hardy—you never know when or where you will meet either or all of them.

DIE LANDESMUTTER

Queen Louisa of Prussia. By MARY MAXWELL MOFFAT.
(Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE character of Queen Louisa, whose memory is cherished in Prussia with affection second only to that lavished upon Frederick the Great, is one of great interest—chiefly, perhaps, because the record of her life is one of consistent progress. The young princess who had an intense craving for culture and was imbued with a religion clearly to be recognised as the keynote of her life, ended by being not only an affectionate spouse and a tender parent—to use the expressive language of the epitaph-writer—but also a figure of considerable importance in the political arena. Had she been a reigning sovereign and not merely her husband's consort her character would in all probability have appeared even stronger, though not of the type of Queen Elizabeth, or even of Queen Victoria. It is well, however, to start with the knowledge that she was no insipid paragon of domestic virtues.

The early life of Princess Victoria was in no way peculiar, though it furnishes us with an interesting record of a case of what was apparently love at first sight on the part of the man whose wife she ultimately became. The Crown Prince Frederick William was a man who, in happier circumstances, might have been worthy of his great-uncle Frederick the Great, who had proudly said: "I shall reign in him again." His education, however, during the early years of his life was entrusted to one named Behmisch, a hypochondriac tortured with misgivings about the sin against the Holy Ghost, so that it was no wonder that he developed into a dull and slow character, rather of the "farmer George" type, and ended his days a bitter opponent of liberal ideas. The influence of his wife upon him was, as Miss Moffat shows, entirely for good, and upon her again there was always the restraining influence of the prim and delightful Mistress of the Household, Countess Voss, a most useful guide through all the delicate intricacies of a Court life.

Until the gathering of the storm before the campaign of Jena the biographer has little to relate beyond the details of the queen's domestic life and interests. She was a girl of great beauty, so that her patronage of the arts was all the more acceptable to those who were her favourites. Richter wrote of her as "the crowned Aphrodite, the lovely queen who wrote and invited me to Sans Souci." "Novalis" said that under her régime a court had become a home, a throne, a holy place, a royal alliance, a union of hearts, and these two examples will serve to show how much the royal praise was valued. Beyond these interests she gradually learnt what she could of the wider issues in politics, and shared the trials and troubles of her husband. That she had become by 1806 a factor to be reckoned with in politics is shown by the notorious series of bulletins which Napoleon intended for publication in a suborned Prussian newspaper rather than for the enlightenment of France. It is an episode to which considerable space is devoted in this new life of the Queen, and rightly so because it shows with wonderful clearness the reverse side of Bonaparte's genius. A bulletin dated two days after the battle of Jena contains the statement that "the queen never ceased to urge the king and his generals to give battle. Blood she would have, and the best blood in the country has been poured out at her behest." A later bulletin announced that Every one is saying what a singular thing it is that the Emperor Napoleon has come to Potsdam, and installed himself in the very apartments occupied by the Tsar when, in the course of his travels last year, he paid his fatal visit to Prussia. From the moment of his arrival the Queen neglected her domestic duties and the serious business of her toilet in order to mix herself up with affairs of State, to bring her adverse influence to bear on her husband's mind and to communicate to others the passion for war which had taken possession of her own breast. The more healthy-minded section of the nation look upon this visit of Alexander as one of the greatest misfortunes that ever befel Prussia.

The influence of such scandals was naturally depressing upon the queen, and the king was exasperated at their publication and at being held up to ridicule as the puppet of his wife. Although she found few defenders of any position or authority, the people never wavered in their devotion to the beautiful queen, and the intended effect was never achieved.

The man who did not hesitate to make his professed religion, which he had selected as likely to be the most useful, subservient to his political and imperial ambitions, had naturally no scruples in using a woman's reputation in a similar way: the brutality of the method, however, is not so remarkable as the fact that Napoleon should have adopted a device so little likely to succeed. It was not often that he so completely misjudged human nature, and his failure seems to have increased his regard for the woman whom he sought to traduce. At St. Helena he once said: "I had a great opinion of the Queen of Prussia. She was graceful, witty and prodigiously insinuating. If the King had brought her to Tilsit at the outset, he would have obtained more favourable terms." Reading at the present time the brief notes of the reported conversation at Tilsit, made by the Swedish Ambassador Brinckmann, one is not over-impressed by the line adopted by the queen, nor yet, for that matter, by Napoleon's artless attempt to lead the conversation towards the feminine topic of frocks and frills. Her pleading was in vain: the army of the great Frederick had been dissolved for ever by Jena and Auerstädt, and Prussia was until 1813 a conquered State. The sufferings endured in the war were light compared with the humiliation inflicted by the treaty of Tilsit, but the ultimate result brought about by the reaction was one of which the leaders of the idealist revolt and of the patriotic league could never in their most sanguine moments have dreamed. The events of 1807 and 1870 are intimately related, and, as the writer of this book says, "no wonder the patriotic German takes pleasure in placing the two dates side by side and expatiating on the significance of the change in the order of the numerals. And the theme may be illustrated by a couple of prints—the one a picture of Louisa vainly interceding with Napoleon I.; the other a representation of Louisa's son receiving the sword of Napoleon III. after Sedan." The name of the queen became in the mouths of the patriots a name with which to conjure, and one remembered even now in much the same spirit as that displayed in Körner's hymn written in commemoration of the banishment to Elba.

There is unhappily another legacy, to which Miss Moffat makes but the briefest allusion, but which is silently brought before us in pictures, reproduced in this volume, wherein the throat of the queen is shown swathed with a scarf. That the writer is so brief on a subject of such interest is a sign of her German attitude towards her heroine. She sees throughout with German glasses, and becomes as Prussian as Queen Louise herself. Napoleon, we venture to assert, is to Miss Moffat what he appeared to that queen who wrote that she "found at Tilsit a great idol (of unknown and unnamed metal) set up for men to worship. And this idol was treading the other two crowned heads underfoot." Yet there were many thousands to whom this idol was a deity of surpassing virtue; and it is the conquered who is always the first to assert, as did Queen Louisa, that the victor is a being with no human heart in his breast. So it is that year by year new artillery is unmasked on either side in the eternal fight about the character of Bonaparte, as new letters and memoirs come to light, and these insidious little side attacks are attractive, especially when conducted with such skill as that shown by Miss Moffat. This is by no means the first life of Queen Louisa, but it certainly is one which will be read with delight by many who will take it as a mere incident in the Napoleonic drama, and by many more perhaps who will regard it as a clear exposition of a good and capable woman's life.

FOR LIBRARIANS

Subject Classification. By JAMES DUFF BROWN. (Library Supply Co., 15s. net.)

ANY system of classification to be of value at the present time must compare favourably with the most important systems in use, chief of which are undoubtedly the "Decimal" and the "Expansive." There is perhaps no other librarian on this side of the Atlantic so qualified to write upon classification as Mr. Brown, but even now the last word has not been said upon the subject; in fact, the whole matter is rather opened up for further discussion. Where formerly the sub-division of subjects was found, to use symbols, in the relation of "B" and "C" to "A," the classification before us finds it in the relation of "A" to "B" and "C." At the same time an all-British system is eminently satisfactory from a topographical point of view. And a system so logical is a great advance in this branch of library science. Its actual permanent position cannot be determined with accuracy until the revised edition of the Decimal and the final sheet of the Expansive systems have been tested. But when it has undergone the revision which will result from practical use, it will, at all events, rank with the great schemes. Briefly the scheme is this: All knowledge as contained in books, is divided into eleven main classes, representing the logical progress from matter and force, through life and mind, to record. These classes are:

- | | |
|------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| A—Generalia | L—Social and Political Science |
| B—D—Physical Science | M—Language and Literature |
| E—F—Biological Science | N—Literary Forms, Fiction, |
| G—H—Ethnology, Medicine | Poetry |
| I—Economic Biology, Domestic | O—W—History and Geography |
| Arts | X—Biography |
| J—K—Philosophy and Religion | |

They are subdivided by means of numbers:

- B 000 is Physical Science.
B 001 Physics.
B 200 Civil Engineering, etc. etc., and similarly in the other classes the addition of numbers denotes sub-division.

Two of the most important features of the system are found in the categorical tables and the biographical combination tables. The former is a series of upwards of a thousand decimal numbers representing forms and sub-divisions, and applicable to all the classes, i.e., the decimal points 1 to 9 represent Bibliography, Encyclopædias, Text-Books (Systematic), Text-Books (Popular) and so on, and may be applied to any of the various classes and sub-divisions.

The biographical combination tables really form part of the notation of the main classification. An author's name beginning with "Aa" would be numbered X 300, after the class number; although the same number used as a first place number would show that the book was a biography, the name of the subject of which began with those letters. "Ab" is represented by 301; "Aba" by 3010, etc., and combinations of these numbers are used for third and fourth letters. The drawback, found in every system of close classification yet devised, of lengthy numbers, is prevalent in the present scheme. In fact, the chief difficulty in close classification in public libraries is not so much that of classifying the books but of devising an efficient terminology, and a concise and sufficiently expansive notation. Such numbers as these are by no means impossible, and are in fact taken from the introduction:

It is scarcely fair to describe the system as an elaboration or an expansion of the old "Adjustable." The main classes of the new scheme have already been given: if they are compared with those of the Adjustable (The Adjustable was Mr. Brown's scheme of 1898, founded on the Quin-Brown system of 1894) it will be seen that the difficulties of grafting the new scheme on to the old would be almost as great as an entire re-arrangement.

The main classes of the Adjustable are:

- A. Sciences.
- B. Useful Arts.
- C. Fine and Recreative Arts.
- D. Social and Political Science.
- E. Philosophy and Religion.
- F. History and Geography.
- G. Biography and Correspondence.
- H. Language and Literature.
- J. Poetry and Drama.
- K. Prose Fiction.
- L. Miscellaneous.

In the various methods of denoting individual books (in past years commonly known as the "call number") given in the introduction, no mention is made of the progressive number in classes. This method is much more convenient than the use of the accession number; and there cannot be duplicate numbers in the same class—two good points in an indicator library.

The chief claim on behalf of the system is that it is a "one place" scheme. In theory this is excellent. But Mr. Brown, ultimately, has been obliged to allow for the influence of "opinion." The place where a book will "be most constantly useful" will differ with individual librarians and with the same librarian at different times; and, more important still, it will differ in different localities.

The treatment of Biography and Criticism opens up the question as to whether biography is better arranged in one class or divided into the particular classes of the subjects of the biographies. Mr. Brown's plan is to place all biographies and criticism in "X," but to place "commentaries and elucidations of single works" with such works. An alternative scheme for the arrangement of an author's works, and for works dealing with the author, suggested by Mr. R. K. Dent (Aston Manor), is given in the introduction, but finds no place in the classification itself. A commendable point in the suggested plan is that works dealing with the man precede his own works. We do not agree at all that it is "a very inconvenient and frequently impossible task" to distribute individual biography at subjects; and the plan is one much preferred by many of the users of public libraries. An absolutely uniform system of classification in all libraries is desirable; but this work more than any other shows its impossibility.

The introduction contains an exact system of classification of Library Economy, Administration and Office Papers, by Mr. L. Stanley Jast (Croydon).

There are several revolutionary proposals, which are nevertheless perfectly scientific when looked at without the prejudice engendered by current use of another method. Chief of these is, possibly, that already mentioned—the amalgamation of the theory and practice of science in one class.

A misprint occurs on page 34: Burns 3462 should be 3464. This occurs in three instances. An excellent index of nearly 18,000 concrete items accompanies the scheme. The Biographical Combination tables give "nearly half a million places"; and the Categorical tables give practically unlimited subdivisions.

THE METAPHYSICS OF COMMON SENSE

Synthetica. Being Meditations Epistemological and Ontological. By S. S. LAURIE, LL.D. 2 vols. (Longmans, 21s. net.)

"PHILOSOPHY always will be hard," writes Mr. Bradley: and the saying appears upon the title-page of Dr. Laurie's book. It is, indeed, singularly appropriate there. As we read Dr. Laurie we cannot escape a sense of strangeness, amounting almost to despair. It all seems aloof and unfamiliar. We are tempted, in our less patient moments, to ask ourselves whether metaphysics, on its epistemological side at any rate, is more than a logomachy, barely respectable in these days of exact science. Well, that is a temptation which besets us all: but one which it is our business to resist. And it is indeed something of an irony that Dr. Laurie, whose own soul is possessed with a passionate sense of the worth and significance of metaphysics, and whose philosophy proclaims itself the philosophy of common sense, should expose us to this temptation in so special a manner. It is a far cry, we find ourselves exclaiming, from common sense to this philosophy! We do not seriously lay this to the door of Dr. Laurie. It is of course in one sense true of any metaphysic. For while the conceptions—or, if you prefer so to put it, the realities—with which metaphysics are concerned are essentially personal and homely, and, so far, close to common sense and every-day experience; they are at the same time just the elements in experience which we are least in the habit of subjecting to criticism. They are so much part of ourselves that we seldom stand far enough away from them to get a view of them: and in that sense any critique of them presents itself to us as unfamiliar and even unnatural. But this tendency, inherent in any metaphysic, is intensified in Dr. Laurie's book by the form under which his metaphysic comes to us. He has a language and a terminology of his own which we can only regard as gratuitously scholastic and unhomely. There can be no question but that his thought would have come to us more easily if he could have written more simply. Is it necessary to use terms so harsh upon our Anglo-Saxon ears as the following: orectivity, beënt (the participle of the verb to be), entitative, hæceity, ultroneously, quiddity, averment, prescinding? And must metaphysics always talk a language as divorced from common speech as are the following two passages, selected entirely at random?

There is, for example, Universal Being differentiated, and thereupon, and eo actu, individuated in and through its negating and affirming phenomenal characters. What then? We have before us a complex presentate which contains entity, quiddity and individuation. But the entity is the quiddity, and the quiddity is, in the sense-world, the phenomenal individuation—the "fulfilled determinate."

The ultimate actual then (let us rather say) is the dialectic determination itself, i.e., essence as individuated in the modal, and, eo actu or transitu, a "determinate." Ultimate actuals are in fact Being and the Dialectic in their primordial "determinates." The cosmic act we might say, is Creative Percipience, and the result is a unit of that creative percipience. These are the primordial actuals out of which the world is built.

We have thought it proper to draw attention to the somewhat unattractive form under which Dr. Laurie presents his metaphysic. We hasten to add that any one who will worry through the form to the substance of the thought in this book will be well repaid. The two volumes here published together approach the subject from different sides, and do, in fact, demand separate consideration. We shall confine ourselves in this article to the first volume. The point of view there is epistemological. In it Dr. Laurie attempts to arrive at the outlines, or schema, of a metaphysic by a critical analysis of knowledge. The second volume will apply the results of this analysis to some of the problems which vex us in regard to the relation of God to man.

"The primary experience is Feeling and a 'felt other' in a synthesis." This fact—the fact, namely, of an "other" as in some way given in all experience—is the point from which Dr. Laurie's metaphysic starts, and to which, we may even say, it in the end returns. It is in the wholeheartedness with which he clings to this "primal actualisation" (the name is his) that he sounds what is perhaps the most characteristic note of his philosophy. The "given," the "other," the "object"—these are for him real and independent: independent at the least in the sense that they do not depend for their reality on the perception of a finite subject. There have been forms of Idealism which have wished to transfer all reality from the side of the object to the side of the subject. To a "natural realist" such as Dr. Laurie such a metaphysic is merely "ludicrous."

Object and subject [he writes] at first and at last and all through, face each other as antagonists, as reciprocally negating energies. This is what I mean by Natural Realism.

Plurality [he says again] is an undoubted empirical fact, and each thing must have its own centre of energy, or be merely the illusory many of a one life: and this is a fatalistic monism.

Or once more:

Natural Realism says that the reality and actuality of an object are in the consciousness of it for the subject that feels and knows; but that the object per se is as much a reality and actuality as the subject per se; neither more nor less.

This is a sound and healthy realism. It maintains that we must accept either the whole of what experience gives us, or none of it. Now experience, equally on the attuent plane and on the plane of dialectic—which we may perhaps render, for the enlightenment of the uninitiated, by "equally on the plane of immediate apprehension and on the plane of reflective perception"—experience gives us in each case an "other" as incontestably as it gives us a self: and philosophy can only be true to the experience of which it claims to be the interpretation if it recognise from the start "and all through" that the self and the not-self rest upon the same foundation.

This aspect, however, of Realism is not the whole truth. Possibly even it is not the more important side of the truth—though we do not feel sure that Dr. Laurie would accept this way of putting it. At any rate it is essential to remember that the other side of the independence, as against each other, of self and "other" is the dependence of both on the Whole or Being within which they are.

If the absolute objective idealist means merely to say that what I, a finite conscious subject, feel and know can ultimately be conceived of only as existing in an Infinite Absolute Consciousness, in which I am in some way involved, although only as a finite consciousness, I shall not care to quarrel with him.

Moreover, subject and object must be conceived of as having some community one with the other. "To believe in the total disparateness of res cogitans and res extensa is in my opinion to give up ultimate philosophy." In other words, the external world, just because we are capable of understanding it, cannot be wholly alien from the thought which appropriates it. The mind—and this is but one point out of many in which we catch in Dr. Laurie's metaphysic an echo of the metaphysic of Aristotle—must in some sense find itself in the world which it knows. The "dialectic" (that is what Dr. Laurie prefers to call it) which is the essence of thought, and which is in a sense the "formal" element in experience, must not be conceived of as a form imposed by the subject upon a sense material which in itself is formless and unmeaning. On the contrary, it is nearer the truth to say that the dialectic only emerges in the mind of the subject because it is already in nature. The formal element in things which makes the world a cosmos is, for Dr. Laurie, "a factual element in every object." The dialectic activity of mind, showing itself in the categories of thought, is "a mere continuing of Objective Dialectic into the subject." "Subjective dialectic is only the Cosmic way whereby the dialectic of things reaches me." "It is the Logic of the mind of man because it is the Logic of Things." If it be necessary to Kantianism to regard the Categories as imposed upon an alien material through the operation of the understanding upon it, then Dr. Laurie certainly is no Kantian. While the mind is, in his view, essentially active in experience—does not merely "receive" the dialectic in things, but "takes" it—that is possible only because the Thought-principles which are operative in the subject are already built into the constitution of the objective world.

Subjective mind, as self-conscious dialectic, is in continuity with the universal dialectic which forces itself into the individual empirical subject as a free initiating energy.

Yes—a free initiating energy. We have here a cardinal point in Dr. Laurie's metaphysic. On the one hand, the free activity of the subject, who has to be his own centre of energy: and on the other hand his dependence upon the Infinite Source of all Being. Dr. Laurie will have nothing to say to any metaphysic which does not do full justice to the independence and freedom of the individual. Epistemology—and it is from epistemology that he is in this first volume approaching metaphysics—reveals the individual to us as not merely passive in thought, but as exercising initiative. Reason is itself an exercise of Will. It is indeed just this spontaneity which distinguishes Reason from the animal consciousness. "On this primary fact of pure intelligence," says Dr. Laurie, "not of moral or pathological motive, I ultimately rest Will as free and autonomous."

How is this spontaneity of the individual to be reconciled with the omnipresence, in subject and in object alike, of the One? We have already seen that the dialectic in nature, which makes it an intelligible system, is the manifestation of Mind as externalised; and that knowledge results from the marriage of this external dialectic with the dialectic in the apprehending Subject. But what guarantee have we in this for the real spontaneity of the individual? Dr. Laurie can himself write: "the subjective dialectic is merely the dialectic of the system energising in him as Will-Reason." What then is there to prevent us from interpreting the fact of "knowing" as the exercise in us of a dialectic of which we are no more than the automatic vehicle? Against any objection of this sort Dr. Laurie can only set his own faith. And this he does in all confidence. He bases his idealism on a criticism of knowledge which "reveals a pure will movement whose form is a dialectic emerging out of the attitudinal subject." And he boldly asserts that "within the vast orb of the Absolute there is freedom in the form of finite reason."

Metaphysically he finds the ground of this freedom, which is for him synonymous with individuality, in what he calls Negation.

Negation in the cosmic process constitutes me "myself," and that tree "itself."

Negation, in other words, is just the principle of differentiation, whereby the One realises itself in the Many, without sacrifice of its oneness. We say "realises itself" advisedly: for the many are called into existence by the one in order to its own completion.

The life or externalization of Absolute Being is as a matter of fact in and through Its own negation.

Or again,

Universal Being can live only in that which, as different and finite, is Its own negation.

And this negation is not outside, and over against, the one, but within it. Not one and many, but one in many, is the true formula: or, as Dr. Laurie characteristically puts it, "there is not Being and negation, but Being in its own negation." "The negation," he says elsewhere, "itself is beent." It may be difficult to understand the how of this relation—and indeed the world-old problem of metaphysic would have melted away if we could see how the One maintains its oneness in and through difference—but we must cling to the fact of it, unless we are prepared to give up philosophy. Dr. Laurie certainly will not sacrifice either term in the relation; either the true oneness of the whole, or the true reality (which for him carries with it the independence) of the parts. And in consequence he is faced with apparent contradictions. On the one hand we find him saying, "From a universal point of view even men and angels are adjectives, substantial adjectives," in the sense that they live and move and have their being within the one Absolute Being "which holds all (so-called) realities as qualities of itself." On the other hand each individual is, for him, so truly a "for-itself working out its own existence" that God himself "does not hold the reality of a tree in the hollow of his hand."

But this contradictory aspect of the relation of the One and the Many is not one of which Dr. Laurie is afraid. Nor need we blame him for that. We may, however, be allowed to question whether it is really epistemological considerations which have led him to this doctrine of the independence of the individual. Epistemology, we have already agreed, reveals to us an activity in judgment: but can it be said to offer us any answer to the question how far in that activity the individual has it in his power to oppose, perhaps to thwart, the will of the Whole? We are tempted to think that the answer to this question has been determined for Dr. Laurie by considerations not purely epistemological.

One healthy result of Dr. Laurie's realism is the rehabilitation of the phenomenal. We have heard much in recent years of the contrast between Appearance and Reality. Dr. Laurie brings us back to Common Sense when he insists that the quality or mode of a thing, its appearance, is; and that knowledge of it is, to that extent, knowledge of the real. "The mode," he tells us, "is just as real as essence is: more real, we may say, because it is essence fulfilled." The essence of an individual, he more than once reminds us, is not concealed by its predicates, but revealed in them. And, consistently with this, knowledge of the phenomenal is not relative in the sense that it is knowledge of the unreal; but only in the sense that it is knowledge of the part. Within the system to which he is confined man's knowledge is absolute.

And here, for the present at any rate, we must leave Dr. Laurie. There are further points on which we could wish to have said something; in particular on the part which the Undetermined plays in his metaphysic—whether as the source of determination, or as the goal to which the individual soul returns after and beyond knowledge. But we have exceeded our limits already. And it will be a pleasure to have some excuse for returning to Dr. Laurie again.

THE NEW ENGLISH HISTORY

The Political History of England. In twelve volumes. Vol. xi. By the late Hon. GEORGE BRODRICK. Completed and revised by J. K. FOTHERINGHAM. (Longmans, 7s. 6d.)

THE survey of our English story which Messrs. Longman undertook in their "Political History" is now approaching its close; and the penultimate volume—the eleventh out of twelve—lies before us. This instalment carries the narrative from the beginning of the nineteenth century down to the Reform period, and leaves it to be finished by the very competent pen of Mr. Sidney Low. The present volume was written by Mr. George Brodrick, the late Warden of Merton, and reveals both the excellences and the limitations of that good man. Mr. Brodrick gloried in a style which hung about him like the folds of a Roman toga, and on one subject he cultivated prejudices of a quite passionate kind. He hated Ireland; and perhaps a certain memory of the Parnell Commission made him hate it more. With that single exception, he possessed the judicial mind, and a type of mental patience which admirably qualified him for the kind of summary work which is required in these volumes.

On the whole, Messrs. Longman have been justified by the results of this undertaking. For its best products, history must depend on the individual genius. The human story requires an interpreter. Even a wrong interpretation is better than none at all. The only reason why man studies his past at all is to obtain some guide to the future. All the great historians—from Thucydides to Macaulay and Carlyle—have found meanings and lessons in the past; and it is for that very reason that they are great historians. But the whole of their work must depend ultimately on accurate research. The annalist must precede the historian; and the more annalists there are to prepare the way, the greater will be our historians. Here is a sphere where "spade-work" is never wasted.

Messrs. Longman have found the clue to the historical works of the future in combination. The vastness of the materials will compel historians to this method. No man nowadays can be an expert in more than one period; and it is difficult enough to know all that is to be known about that. Much blame has been lavished on Froude for mistakes of copying. Might not he have avoided most of those mistakes if he had trained a good copyist to do the work for him? Professor Gardiner wore himself out with the labours of transcription. But surely every Professor of History ought to have at least one, if not two, clerks attached to his chair, whose work it would be to become familiar with mediæval handwritings, and to copy old manuscripts with accuracy.

Perhaps, after all, the most useful part of these volumes will be the appendices containing lists of authorities. It is impossible in so short a compass to supersede these authorities or to give any adequate digest of them. Mr. Brodrick labours at the oar; but too often his pages are little more than a summary of our old friend, the "Annual Register." The plain fact is that the only really pleasant way of reading history is to get behind both the historians and the annalists and to read the living letters and lively memoirs of the day. The memoirs alone explain the French Revolution: the English Court of the late eighteenth century will become intelligible only to those who read Fanny Burney's diary. Similarly, the Hutchinson memoirs and the Verney papers throw a flood of light on the Civil War times; and the Paston letters alone give you back the England of the Wars of the Roses.

If, then, these volumes gave us only a summary of authorities, they would be immensely valuable. But they give us much more. They supply us with a set of invaluable reference-books for our libraries; and they provide for students books which, in tone and temper, are admirably adapted for giving the first impressions of English history.

THE SIGN

"As like as brother to brother
Is Love to Lust;
How can I tell, my Mother,
Love from Lust?"

"The eyes of each are as springs
Clear and sweet;
On the shoulders of each are wings—"
"Child on the feet,

"On the feet of Love are wings!
On the feet of Lust
For a sign and a warning clings
A little dust."

LANDSCAPE IN THE BRONTË NOVELS

It is possible that no one will again convey within the pages of a single work the sense of atmosphere with which Emily Brontë informed "Wuthering Heights." These and a few poems are all that her genius has left to us; she died at the outset of her career, and her reputation would seem to be sustained less by her own literary efforts than by the magnificent success which her elder sister achieved.

Upon examining the book in question we find that the descriptions of scenery are in all cases brief, though extraordinarily effective; they are used for no purposes of padding but simply because they are essential to the story itself, as inevitable as the unfolding of the plot. Swinburne in his sympathetic note on the Brontës affirms that there was indeed "a dark unconscious instinct of primitive nature-worship in the passionate great genius of Emily Brontë which found no corresponding quality in her sisters."

Hers was what he calls the "tragic use of landscape"; her love for the moors, he says:

exhales as a fresh wild odour from a bleak shrewd soil, from every storm-swept page of "Wuthering Heights." All the heart of the league-long billows of rolling and breathing and brightening heather is blown with the breath of it on our faces as we read; and all the wind and all the sound and all the fragrance and freedom and gloom and glory of the high north moorland.

The Spirit of Place possessed her; she had tracked it to its inmost shrine. The love of the "brown hills" was in her blood recalling the passionate lines of her great contemporary, Elizabeth Browning:

My own hills! Are you 'ware of me my hills
How I burn toward you? Do you feel to-night
The urgency and yearning of my soul
As sleeping mothers feel the sucking babe
And smile? . . . Still ye go
Your own determined, calm, indifferent way
Toward sunrise, shade by shade, and light by light.

And as that beloved prospect from Bellosguardo across the serene and shining Val D'Arno to the purple hills of Vallombrosa and the "silver spear-points" of the Carrara mountains, with the green length of the plain broken by the white City of Flowers, was dear to Elizabeth Browning, so were the bleak grey moorlands above Haworth dear to the heart of Emily Brontë. No one who has seen the beauty of those moors beyond Keighley in August when the pink flush of blossoming heather clothes them with a glory of colour can ever forget the sight. It is with a cry of sharpest nostalgia that Catherine Earnshaw recounts to Nellie Deans her dream of finding herself in Heaven.

Heaven [she says] did not seem to be my home, and I broke my heart with weeping to come back to earth, and the angels were so angry that they flung me out into the middle of the heath on the top of Wuthering Heights where I awoke sobbing for joy.

In this poignant passage we obtain a glimpse of the feeling Emily Brontë had for those wind-swept spaces where her childhood had been spent—of her craving for them when for a time she was transplanted to the uncongenial atmosphere of a foreign school. She writes of them always with an incontestable truth, as of things desperately dear and familiar and intimate, with the result that they become to the reader suggestive word-pictures that linger in the memory.

Perhaps there is nothing more pathetic in the whole book than the scene where Catherine Linton, having torn her pillow in feverish frenzy, proceeds to pull out the feathers and arrange them one by one on the sheet.

That's a turkey's [she murmured to herself], and this is a wild-duck's, and this is a pigeon's. Ah, they put pigeon's feathers into the pillows—no wonder I couldn't die! And here is a moor-cock's, and this—I should know it among a thousand—it's a lapwing's. Loony bird wheeling over our heads in the middle of the moor! It wanted to get to its nest, for the clouds had touched the swells and it felt rain coming. This feather was picked up from the heath. The bird was not shot; we saw its nest in the winter full of little skeletons.

Always homesick for the Heights, she tells Linton, when he puts some golden crocuses on her pillow: "These are always the earliest flowers at the Heights—they remind me of soft thaw winds and nearly-melted snow."

The snow has quite gone down here, darling [Linton says in reply] and I only see two white spots on the whole range of moors; the sky is blue and the larks are singing, and the beck and brooks are brim full.

Thus in a few words she gives us a picture delicately fashioned of the tardy Yorkshire spring, and we know that she must have watched these things happen until they had become a part of her life.

Every word of description in "Wuthering Heights" accentuates the tragic gloom of the story so that it seems to become incorporated with the remote, lonely moorland, wild, grey and desolate, that forms its background. And throughout with a consummate if half-unconscious art Emily Brontë voices her own passionate love for the grey solitudes around Haworth. She expresses it most definitely in the words of the elder Catherine in her moments of acute nostalgia for her childhood's home. For Catherine is always an alien at the Grange; in her last illness she urges Nellie Deans to pull up the blinds that she may see the distant light shining at Wuthering Heights, and open the window that she may feel the wind as it "comes straight from the moors." One of the most perfect passages of description is given just before that last terrible meeting of Catherine and Heathcliff. It is full of quiet calm, as if to show in greater contrast the wild, passionate scene that follows it:

Gimmerton chapel bells were still ringing and the full mellow flow of the beck came soothingly to the ear. It was a sweet substitute for the yet absent murmur of the summer foliage which drowned that music about the Grange when the trees were in leaf. At Wuthering Heights it always sounded on quiet days following a great thaw or a season of steady rain.

One is, perhaps, glad that this wild book has a peaceful and happy conclusion. It ends in the words of Mr. Lockwood, as he stands beside the grave of the elder Catherine which had been "dug on a green slope in the corner of the kirkyard where the wall is so low that heath and bilberry plants have climbed over it from the moor":

I lingered [he says] round them under that benign sky; watched the moths fluttering among the heath and harebells, listened to the soft wind breathing through the grass and wondered how any one could ever imagine unquiet slumbers for the sleepers in that quiet earth.

In her preface to "Wuthering Heights," written after the death of her sister, Charlotte Brontë indignantly repudiates the idea that the book was by the author of "Jane Eyre"—"an earlier and ruder attempt by the same pen." It is impossible not to wonder now at this inspired suggestion of the critics. For it is certain that few Brontë lovers will readily admit the superiority of "Jane Eyre" or "Villette" over "Wuthering Heights." "Wuthering Heights" has not the sustained dramatic force, the thrilling interest, of "Jane Eyre," nor the bitter humour, the perfect development that characterise "Villette." But as a work of art not a few have found it incontestably superior. There is scarcely a sentence one would wish to change. The fundamental fault of its construction vanishes with the second reading. The reader may be a little confused at first—may find himself unable to discover who is who. The manner of its narration by an old housekeeper to the tenant, Mr. Lockwood, who at times intervenes with his own story, told also in the first person, is essentially awkward. These faults are the faults of inexperience, and ignorance of technical form; they cannot mar the book as a whole any more than the absurd scene of "Baroness Ingram of Ingram Park" can mar the immortal history of "Jane Eyre."

Charlotte Brontë is never lavish of description. In "Jane Eyre," indeed, there is little scope for it, the story rushes on at too great a pace, yet the scenes are engraved eternally upon the memory. It is in "Shirley"—probably the least read of her books—that Charlotte Brontë's use of landscape is most prominent, yet even there she is always economical of her local colour. We feel at once that, like Emily's, it is autobiographical, that when she writes of the moors it is of familiar things deeply engraved upon a receptive, observant mind. There is an unforgettable scene where Caroline Helston describes how she once watched the clouds come down from the mountains:

I stood at the window an hour watching them. The hills seemed rolled in a sullen mist, and when the rain fell in whitening sheets they were blotted from the prospect, they were washed from the world.

We know, too, that Haworth is in her mind when she writes of wandering across the "boundless waste of deep heather, seeing nothing but wild sheep, hearing nothing but the cries of wild birds." Those desolate solitudes were as dear to her as to her sister, but she had not quite the same poignant gift of expressing them. I think the reason of this may be found in the fact that Emily Brontë was a poet in a sense that neither of her sisters were; she had the delicate discrimination, the art of observing nature from the fine standpoint of the poet. Charlotte Brontë comes nearest to it when she describes St. John's last look at the moors before he leaves for India:

The breeze was from the west; it came over the hills sweet with scents of heath and rush; the sky was of stainless blue. . . . We reached the first stragglers of a battalion of rocks guarding a sort of pass beyond which the beck rushed down a waterfall and where still, a little further on, the mountain shook off turf and flower, had only heath for raiment and crag for gem; where it guarded the forlorn hope of solitude and a last refuge for silence.

The ending of "Villette" is ushered in with a strange force; she seems to break through the Brontë restraint and reserve; she will not write of the tragedy in words, but we feel it, sinister and foreboding, in every line:

The skies hang full and dark, a rack sails from the west; the clouds cast themselves into strange forms—arches and broad radiations; there rise resplendent mornings, glorious, royal, purple as monarch in his state. . . . the heavens are one flame. . . .

That storm roared frenzied for seven days; it did not cease till the Atlantic was strewn with wrecks. Not till the destroying angel of tempest had achieved his perfect work would he fold the wings whose waft was thunder—the tremor of whose plumes was storm.

The story of the Brontës has been told too often. But we know in the words of Charlotte Brontë (in which she briefly alludes to the ever-present tragedy of their brother Branwell)—that they had been called upon to "contemplate near at hand and for a long time, the terrible effects of talents misused and faculties abused." There can be little doubt that this sinister influence, obtruding upon the serenity of the lonely Yorkshire parsonage, exercised a strong effect upon the thoughts and the writings of all three sisters. It gave a certain morbidity to the work of both Charlotte and Anne;

they seemed unable to shake themselves free from it. But Emily Brontë may be said to have regarded it with a sense of detachment. In its wildest, most lawless, most passionate scenes, "Wuthering Heights" is never morbid; the incidents are related with a sang-froid, a calmness that are the more surprising when we consider the source that inspired them. We detect in it the spirit which would not surrender—which made Emily Brontë desire to meet death "standing up"—a something dour and unquenchable in her nature, stubborn in its resistance to the worst onslaughts of fate. Of her Charlotte Brontë writes that "day by day when I saw with what a front she met suffering I looked on her with an anguish of wonder and love . . . I have never seen her parallel in anything."

Summer after summer the moors from Keighley to Haworth are clad in their garb of royal purple and one may still wander among those solitudes—hearing nothing but the cries of wild birds and the murmur of the swollen beck as it flows over the pebbles—and dream of the brave sisters who against such fearful odds gave these immortal works to the world.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE LATER POEMS OF WILLIAM MORRIS

HAZLITT in one of the greatest passages of his prose made a kind of epic of the adventures of Coleridge's mind among the arts and philosophies and religions of the world, and his epic concluded with the bitter reflection that all this mass of learning and eloquence had ended in swallowing doses of oblivion and in writing paragraphs for the Courier. If there were any living writer capable of making such an epic about William Morris he would not have to deal only with the adventures of a mind, with dreams and passive experiences, nor would there be any bitterness of disappointment in his close. For Morris, who began like Coleridge with a poetry of pure romance and who rivalled even Coleridge in his curiosity and learning, was never even threatened by the dangers that overcame Coleridge and have weakened so many minds like his. He was not one of those who cannot find their way out of dreams into an inspiring reality. Romance for him was not an idle refuge from facts that he feared, nor did he lose his music with his youth. Having dreamt of a beautiful world, he was not satisfied with his dream but tried to make it come true. He acted as well as thought like a poet, and therefore he was able at last to make his poetry out of his own actions. The few poets who have done this are the heroes of their kind, and they die in a glory of victory like that which surrounded Nelson at Trafalgar. They are men whom no experience can rob of their hope and their passion, who love life and yet withstand it, who endure without falling into any habit of dull acquiescence, in whom the ardour of dawn persists through the burden and heat of the day until it is renewed in the flush of sunset. Many even of those who most admire Morris have regretted that, like Milton, he should have spent so much of his middle age upon the bitterness of controversy. They think that the great poet, the great artist, was wasted in declaiming to indifferent crowds at street corners. They forget what a terrible amount of living must go to the making of a few great verses; and they, like the rest of the world, seem not to be aware that a few poems of Morris's late life are of a different order of greatness from anything which he wrote while he was still content to be only a poet and an artist. Morris himself would have been angry at any attempt to justify his actions by the quality of his writings. So great was his desire to better the lives of the poor that he came to think of his poetry almost as a stolen amusement, and he wrote but little of it in his later years. That little may do more at last to persuade the world than all his preaching; for poetry was his proper language and in poetry alone was he able to make men see the glory of what he desired and so to inflame them with his desire. Yet we may be sure that, unless his desire had been strong enough to move him to preach at street corners, it would never have moved him to write poetry like "The Message of the March Wind" or "Mother and Son."

These poems contain secrets of life that were hidden from all the other great poets of his time and from all the statesmen and philosophers; yet they are expressed in words so simple that an age which loves complexity for its own sake cannot understand their wisdom and power. Men read the "Defence of Guenevere," and "Jason," and "The Earthly Paradise." But they seem to read "Sigurd" but little and "Poems by the Way" scarcely at all. Very likely after "The Earthly Paradise" the world came to the conclusion that Morris had written enough poetry and took it for granted that "Sigurd" was only another long poem of the same kind. But the few who have read "Sigurd" know that it is a tale, not of things that never have been, but of things that are; that Morris chose to tell this story of heroes because life for him had become a heroic story full of wonder and beauty yet tainted by some malignant power that he, like Sigurd, went forth to discover and destroy. The evil things of the old Saga, the gold and the magic draught that bewildered Sigurd, seem in Morris's poem to be symbols of all the evil of life; and when Sigurd, his mind clouded by the potion, rides blindly round the house of Brynhild, he seems to be an image of Morris himself ranging about the fires of industry and feeling that his strength too is bewildered by some spell that will not let him pierce them. Indeed the forces that make for the death of Sigurd and the end of the Nibelungs are vague and inexplicable in his telling of the story, as the forces that turn the labours of men to ugliness and squalor then seemed vague and inexplicable to Morris himself.

"Sigurd" was published in 1876, and it was about this time that his mind began to be troubled with political questions. He had long wondered what ailed the modern world that it could produce nothing but ugliness. Now he saw that this ugliness was the symptom of a deep disease, and gradually all his passion and thought were gathered together into a desire to cure it. He learnt to pity the world with a compassion so great that it left him no energy to spare for any more long works of original poetry; but in 1885 a series of poems of his began to appear in the Commonweal, the paper of the newly founded Socialist League. The first of them was "The Message of the March Wind." Among others were "Mother and Son," and "The Half of Life Gone." All of them were published afterwards in "Poems by the Way" together with other poems new and old of varying merit. "Poems by the Way" appeared in 1891. Many volumes of minor poetry have had more notice and praise than it has ever had; and this is my excuse for speaking of it now. I do not know why it has been neglected; perhaps because some of the poems in it are full of socialism; perhaps because they are all very simple; and very likely because the world is rather tired of the Earthly Paradise. But whatever the reason may be, the world is losing a great deal through its neglect. Morris always wrote his poetry too quickly, and there are faults of haste even in some of the best of these poems; but they are very small faults, while their merits are of a kind not to be found in any other poetry of our time. Morris had written poetry of pure romance, and then he turned away from romance to face the evils of his own day. He had looked first into the past and then into the present. In these poems he seems to look through the present into a future growing out of it and yet flushed with all the glory of the past, as if he were watching the life of man from a great height at sunset and straining towards the distances that would be revealed at dawn. But with this breadth of vision he combines the simplicity and clearness and poignancy of a ballad written about particular men and women. When Shelley dreamed of a golden age to be he could not connect it in any way with the present or with men and women as he knew them. Something wonderful was to happen, like the rising of Demogorgon in "Prometheus Unbound," and then the heart of man and of nature itself would be changed. The moon and the earth would sing songs of joy together and all harsher sounds would be lost in their music. Shelley could think of nothing for regenerated man to do in his Paradise except wander among the flowers and write poetry about his own happiness, and his regenerated man seems to have lost his humanity with his sorrows. But Morris thought of the men and women that he knew, not transformed by any miraculous change of nature, but freed by their own effort from the accidental evils of to-day. He imagined for them a life such as he had made for himself, full of delightful labours justly requited yet free from his own trouble of seeing all the world less fortunate than himself. His dream was not of a flowery wilderness of beautiful wild creatures, but of a common-wealth that should make a well-ordered garden of the world, subduing it with happy toil and adorning it with noble buildings. He knew by experience what are the pleasures that never weary the mind of healthy man, and he enumerates them in this passage of "The Day is Coming":

And what wealth then shall be left us
When none shall gather gold
To buy his friend in the market,
And pinch and pine the sold?

Nay, what save the lovely city,
And the little house on the hill,
And the wastes and the woodland beauty
And the happy fields we till;

And the homes of ancient stories,
The tombs of the mighty dead;
And the wise men seeking out marvels,
And the poet's teeming head;

And the painter's hand of wonder;
And the marvellous fiddle-bow,
And the banded choirs of music:
All those that do and know.

Morris is the only poet who could have written such a ballad of the hopes of man, for to him alone had those hopes become as real and as definite as any tale of real men and women was to a ballad-maker.

But even more moving is the Message of the March Wind with its contrast between the delight of happy lovers in the beauty of the earth and of the past and the lot of the city poor who can never enjoy that beauty.

From township to township, o'er down and by tillage
Far far have we wandered and long was the day:
But now cometh eve at the end of the village,
Where over the grey wall the church riseth grey.

There is the delight expressed as only Morris could have expressed it; and then the wind blowing from London calls to his mind those to whom he cannot communicate it even with his magic of words.

This land we have loved in our hope and our leisure
For them hangs in heaven, high out of their reach;
The wide hills o'er the sea-plain for them have no pleasure,
The grey homes of their fathers no story to teach.

The singers have sung and the builders have builded,
The painters have fashioned their tales of delight;
For what and for whom hath the world's book been gilded,
When all is for these but the blackness of night?

But all the elements of his inspiration are most completely gathered and fused together in the poem called "Mother and Son." In it a mother tells her baby of all the innermost secrets of her heart. The setting of the poem is so contrived that the poet too is able to speak in it of all the things that most deeply move him. The mother is a country woman now in London, who can contrast the joys of her past life with the miseries of the town.

Now, to thee alone will I tell it
That thy mother's body is fair,
In the guise of the country maidens
Who play with the sun and the air;
Who have stood in the row of the reapers
In the August afternoon,
Who have sat by the frozen water
In the high day of the moon,
When the lights of the Christmas feasting
Were dead in the house on the hill,
And the wild geese gone to the salt-marsh
Had left the winter still.

In a most wonderful passage she fancies that she can whisper these joys into the mind of her child, so that he shall keep them through all the labours of his life.

Ah, son, in the days of thy strife,
If thy soul could but harbour a dream
Of the blossom of my life.
It would be as the sunlit meadows
Beheld from a tossing sea,
And thy soul should look on a vision
Of the peace that is to be.

For the son is to carry on the work of the father, who is such a one as Morris himself, and the mother dreams that her child, begotten unlike the children of the city in a great love and hope, shall grow to be the deliverer of the world.

But sure from the wise and the simple
Shall the mighty come to birth;
And fair were my fate, beloved,
If I be yet on the earth
When the world is awoken at last,
And from mouth to mouth they tell
Of thy love and thy deeds and thy valour,
And thy hope that none can quell.

So the poem ends. It is full, no doubt, of memories of Morris's own youth, of his own hopes and fears and loves, but they are all adapted to the speaker with a divination of a woman's heart such as no other writer except Tolstoy could have practised; and Tolstoy himself, with his oriental half despair of man's efforts could not have practised it to so noble a purpose. As an instance of this divination I will give a passage in which the mother recognises that her child will never again be so much her own as he is now.

Lo amidst London I lift thee,
And how little and light thou art,
And thou without hope or fear,
Thou hope and fear of my heart!
Lo here thy body beginning.
O son, and thy soul and thy life;
But how will it be if thou livest
And enterest into the strife,
And in love we dwell together
When the man is grown in thee,
When thy sweet speech I shall hearken,
And yet 'twixt thee and me
Shall rise the wall of distance,
That round each one doth grow,
And maketh it hard and bitter
Each other's thoughts to know.

There are many other beautiful things in "Poems by the Way," but this, I think, is the chief of them all. It is a poem that no youthful imagination could have produced; for it is full of the wisdom of years and pain, of hopes made real by labour and disappointment, of the love that only comes with knowledge. It is as simple as an old song because Morris was in no doubt about what he desired for himself and for the world; it has all the magical sound and imagery of romance because his dreams were fashioned out of real things and with them he laboured to make his dreams come true. It is not a kind of fairy gift, a charm to make us forget the world; but rather a charm to make us love it, for, like the great actions of heroes, it gives us a deeper sense of the beauty and promise of human life.

DRAMA

THE WINTER'S TALE

It was in the nature of things that the talented and versatile author of Bootie's Baby should be attracted by the stage. Vast though the public of a popular novelist, how much vaster that of even the unpopular playwright! A failure has to be witnessed by at least five hundred persons, a very much larger audience than is usually vouchsafed to a volume of poems or an unsuccessful volume of essays; but, when the dramatist is, as in the present case, a household word, a classic of heart, hearth and home, his or her sphere of influence is capable of immense development on the boards of a theatre. I admire the way in which Mr. Beerbohm Tree, always sure of his audience, has assumed that every one will know John Strange Winter. The play requires no title, like a conjuring trick at Maskelyne's; following an idiom it is styled simply The Winter's Tale. And indeed we have all come to talk about Pinero's play and Sutro's play, or, in cases when the management outshines the drama, we say "Barker's production," "Bourchier's latest." Sooner or later all our great philosophic novelists—Hall Caine, Robert Hichens, Sir Gilbert Parker, Conan Doyle, A. E. W. Mason—become either members of Parliament or dramatists. We live in a transition age. It is due doubtless to what Ibsen calls somewhere "The law of small change." A great actor has recently become a dramatic critic. Dramatic critics are nearly always dramatists in petto. It is inevitable that these emigrants should carry some of the luggage of a former existence into the new countries of their adoption.

I once knew an auctioneer's son who, becoming a literary gent, objected to the phrase "under the circumstances" because the metaphor suggested the paternal hammer. Nothing so morbid has affected our dramatist. She is anxious to remind us of former triumphs as a story teller. Leontes, though fashionably tailored by Mr. Percy McQuoid and disguised for the King of Sicily, is merely Bootie; while the old seaside favourite is physically reincarnated in the baby Perdita, left behind on the beach. There is always about this writer's work a freshness, a breezy modernity which concentrates and counteracts for us at the same time the essence of the age. An old playgoer and an old newspaper reader may be excused, however, for pointing out to the younger generation, in the spirit of Mr. Algernon Ashton, some of the materials which have contributed to this engaging production. Readers of a recent and too shortly lived correspondence in a contemporary will recognise in "Are we too squeamish?" the germ of the Trinacrian monarch's final decision and subsequent remorse. "Should women vote?" contained, I believe, the chrysalis of Paulina; her too sanguine confidence in a coup de l'enfant or in the sentimentality of Leontes, and especially the treatment she received, recall the disappointment of the suffragettes with Mr. Asquith. But from her magnanimous error she solved the puzzling question: "Is marriage a failure?" "Unjudicial separation by Statute for sixteen years" should appeal to Sir Gorell Barnes and might pacify Sir Walter Phillimore. You see what Paulina Tanqueray would have become in another sphere of life: the champion of women's rights, and apparently an art collector, a sort of Mrs. Jack Gardiner, with a partiality for Giulio Romano. Unnecessarily wilful and unpleasantly Norwegian is the character of Mopsa. Admirers of Robert Louis Stevenson will be delighted to renew acquaintance with Prince Florizel, "the handsomest tobacconist in London," played with great spirit by Mr. Basil Gill, who nevertheless requires a few dancing lessons from his charming partner, Miss Viola Tree. With some difficulty I obtained a book of the words and find that the censor has suppressed several topical allusions, which might have got a hand from an unfashionable audience. "The Emperor of Russia was my father" did not reach me in the balcony, and the play has been considerably cut for stage purposes; but all lovers of Wintereana will be glad to learn from Mr. Tree that the text is quite pure. It still seems a great deal too long; but of this it is unfair to speak until one has witnessed the sixth performance by the Gregorian or Garrick calendar. With a little ingenuity, and editing of the first scene, the exposure of Perdita (quite a pure exposure) might have finished act one; and Time's monologue, one of the lamest apologies for romantic drama which I have ever heard from Mr. Walkley, might be shortened with advantage. Many of the audience seemed to relish the reference to a recent controversy on criticism:

There is no truth at all in the oracle,
The season shall proceed.

The very welcome thunder which immediately follows and the death of Cranquebille, I mean Mamilius, proved in the words of Zadkiel's almanac "that people at this time of the year should avoid making rash statements." The dignity of Mr. Arthur Bourchier (I mean Leontes), however, did not suffer; I am of a jealous disposition myself, and my sympathy went out to him. This, I think, is the greatest praise I can humbly offer that admirable actor Mr. Arthur Bourchier (I mean Mr. Charles Warner) in his interpretation of a dismal part, which is rightly compared (in the preface to the book of the words) with the dreary Admetus of Euripides. Mrs. Tree acted so well as Paulina that when she announced Hermione's death I was entirely taken in. I felt somewhat indignant that we were going to be cheated out of Miss Ellen Terry for the rest of the evening. I thought of organising a riot; and then I suddenly remembered that I had not paid for my seat. A policeman on duty however assured me that Hermione came to life again. He had witnessed the rehearsal as a representative of the Lord Chamberlain who said he was unable to get through the play in manuscript without going to sleep. How fortunate we are in possessing an intelligent official who can depute to a man of letters, an officer of the most potent, if not the most intellectual, force in the country, the task of keeping out anything natural or human or probable from the stage: never intended I am sure for the presentation of common experiences or so-called artistic and psychological situations. But for him (economical of my pronouns my compliments are intended for the Lord Chamberlain and the policeman) who knows what Mrs. Winter's Tale might have been. All that horrid story about George IV. and Perdita might have been raked up. Unwholesome discussions about morganatic bathing and mixed marriages would have filled the Press, especially at the present silly season. Morbid crowds would have flocked to the Wallace Collection to see the wretched woman's picture. No! such stories are all very well for the closet, for history, for the Royal Academy, or for Mrs. Winter's shilling seaside books, but not for our pure and noble stage. As a writer in a Scotch paper of August 29 said:

The poor critic is puzzled to know how to treat them; if he should denounce them he simply directs attention to them and draws those who seek to a place where it may be found. To familiarise minds with the seamy side of human life is to prepare the way for a race of degenerates. There are at present alarming symptoms of a recrudescence of the sex problem which it was fondly hoped had expired some ten years ago.

I cannot be sufficiently grateful to that journal for striking this note of warning.

Let us consider how The Winter's Tale would have been treated by Mr. Shaw or one of his parasites, keeping in perspective our Scotch critic. Hermione would have been guilty; Mamilius would have lived, a wreck of a child, inheriting all the bohemian tastes of his real father, Polixenes. The pulmonary trouble, derived from Hermione, of which Doctor Camomillo had warned the mother, would have manifested itself before the end of Act ii., and the lad would have displayed no taste for the manly sports distinguishing the healthy public Sicilian schoolboy. Paulina, an ex-sister of Charity, proprietress of a Palermo café chantant, would have induced Hermione to pose as a living picture in one of the disgraceful turns which stain the Sicilian variety stage. There, she would be recognised from the box by the neuropathic Leontes. We should have heard, we may be sure, more of the Scandinavian ladysmaid Mopsa, the one discordant note as it is in an otherwise fine play which brings the scent of Theocritean Vetch over the footlights. I can imagine even the title with which Mr. Shaw would have endowed his unpleasantly suggestive dramalet: Ask Mamilus or Draw it mild—some hideous double entente of that sort. But why dwell on what we have fortunately escaped? Let us be thankful not for the small mercies but the great ones afforded us by Mr. Tree, though his absence from the caste makes one think of Elsinore without the ghost. Miss Ellen Terry, of whom Madam Bernhardt said: "She is not a great actress, but she is more a woman than all the women in the world," belies and endorses the epigram; for here you see her a great actress, a great personality and, I may almost say, a great religion. Miss Viola Tree need not fear that we shall accuse her of superstition in that she should "kneel and implore her blessing." Mrs. Tree, is, of course, admirable, as usual, in her gesture, and particularly in rendering the blank verse, never alas! a very high quality in the Tale. The irritating clipped words: the continual crasis, as it used to be called; the slovenly compression of three syllables into one in order to make the verses scan, evince great carelessness on the part of the smart set in looking after their language, let alone their morals. No wonder that President Rusefelt and Father Vorn and the Scotch critic are advocating reformation, and except that I see a certain symbolisme voulu I would chide Mrs. Winter, who writes all her novels in delightful and straightforward English.

FINE ART

THE GARDEN STUDIO

It is strange that many people, interested in art, are unaware of the existence of an exhibition of extreme interest, which is open to the public each Saturday and Sunday afternoon—the "Garden Studio" of that great painter of romance, Edward Burne-Jones. The studio is situated in the garden at the back of the "Grange," the house to which the artist moved in 1867, and where he chiefly lived until his death in 1898. It is entered from Liscar Terrace, the road which runs at the back of the garden, and a few yards from the door can still be seen the long narrow slit in the wall through which large canvases were passed. In the re-arranged interior will be found most of Burne-Jones's unfinished pictures—indeed, all the paintings in the room, with the exception of the Fall of Lucifer, are unfinished—and many beautiful pencil drawings. To students this exhibition is of extreme value and interest, showing as it does the methods and technique, and—more than these—the unwearying patience and loving care which Burne-Jones so ungrudgingly gave to everything relating to his work. So that this studio contains not only the visible proofs of the master's care and labour, but also that invisible virtue which is the essence of all art. Here among his canvases and drawings are many interesting examples of his watring application to the smallest and most technical details. The unfinished Merlin and Vivien hangs here, a witness to his scrupulous honesty of workmanship, as it was abandoned, though well advanced, on account of the paint not holding firmly enough to the canvas, but showing a tendency to peel off. Here also, laid aside, possibly for some technical fault, are the beginnings of the Garden of Pan and the fair cymbal-beating Aurora, clad in flame colour, and passing with lovely delicate feet along the cool-coloured waterway. Facing the door hangs the large picture of Love's Wayfaring, abandoned at the call of Death. This canvas was among the last of the large pictures on which the artist was engaged, and would have been, had he lived to finish it, one of his most important works. The first sketch for it was begun as far back as 1871, in pencil. On the right of the door on entering hangs a large study of it on brown paper; but the work on the large canvas has gone hardly further than the drawing and primary monochrome painting, and is indeed in one place not yet drawn. It represents Love standing in a chariot, which is being drawn down a narrow street by lovers. All who meet this Car of Love must turn and become a yoke-fellow with those already harnessed to it. Among the pencil drawings on the high stand which runs down the centre of the studio, will be noticed a charming study of the head of one of the girls harnessed to the chariot; a subtle curious face, in whose beauty there is "some strangeness," a little far from the Burne-Jones "type," which is so clear in the beautiful beginning of the Venus Concordia, which hangs on the right on entering, and just under the Passing of Venus—a design in water-colour for tapestry, which was the last design worked on by the master. In Venus Concordia which is a lovely antithesis to Venus Discordia—in which Venus and the attendant Furies watch, sinister and baleful, a riot of discord and murder—the peace of the still garden where she sits enthroned is walled in, and lovers wander here across the tender grass, or rest under Spring trees. Cupid—a little child—sleeps on the steps of the throne, at the feet of Venus, and the three Graces stand at her right hand. In her left she holds an apple, and delicate columbines blossom at her feet. This picture was begun by a pencil drawing in the same year as the great Love's Wayfaring, and was, together with the Venus Discordia, part of the design for the large triptych of the story of "Troy Town," of which the Wheel of Fortune is the completed part. In this unfinished canvas of Venus Concordia the painting has just arrived at the stage when monochrome has begun to gleam into colour, and here the student can easily follow some of the rather elaborate methods which the master employed. First a pencil sketch was made, with studies in elaborate detail, this was generally followed by a small water colour from which was made a large coloured drawing, generally of the size of the intended picture, and from this the drawing on the final canvas was copied, and more studies made. Only then was the final painting commenced. As can be noted in this picture, the design was first painted in thick monochrome—plainly visible in the sleeping Cupid at the foot of the throne—and was then left to dry, often for months.

On this foundation was begun the last painting, visible in the face of Venus, which is beginning to gain the final finish of surface.

To Burne-Jones the duty of an artist included the laborious training of a craftsman, and the careful study of the materials used in his art; the permanence of the colours, the quality of the canvas, and such details of a merely technical nature.

He once told a student that his chief difficulty had been the arrangement of drapery, and that he considered this branch of art to be dying out. To what perfection he brought it, and with what labour, can be seen notably in the delicate pencil studies of sleeves for The Annunciation and of draperies for The Days of Creation. These studies, together with many others, of hands, feet, heads, armour, and the lovely drawing of Madonna lilies, would in themselves form an exhibition of supreme interest. Among them are small studies for the large design of Fortitude, a small full-length nude figure study, a head with close helmet of plate and chain armour, and a little tinted sketch; while among those used as illustrations are to be found twelve designs for the tale of Pygmalion and the Image, and for the story of Perseus ten designs in water-colour on brown paper, with a broad and elaborately decorated border.

The last years of the artist's life were to have been devoted to Arthur in Avalon and Love's Wayfaring, and the designs which hang in the studio of the Hill Fairies were intended as a pendant to the former. One regrets that there are no studies here for the picture itself, those belonging to it having passed into the hands of the owner of the finished painting. There is said to be an oil design for this picture in the possession of Lady Burne-Jones, but it differs considerably from the larger canvas. Attention should be called, among other pictures, to the lovely, small unfinished oil of Cupid and Psyche, where the dull-robed Cupid catches in his arms the falling figure of his beloved, while, as a dark background, flows the Styx, under the sombre hills. Against the darkness float and fall roses of flame and paler flame. Here too can be seen the fine single figure design of Fortitude standing upon a rampart unmoved amid the arrows of the enemy, and the design of the Sirens, which was not completed: a ship entering a rocky harbour between two rows of sirens, who watch its approach with strange sidelong gaze. A small oil of The Ring given to Venus should not go unnoticed. It would require too much space to enumerate more of the works contained in this Gallery, which forms a fair and fitting monument to the unfailing labour for, and love of, Art, of the painter of A World of Dreams.

ART IN AMERICA

THE tariff on works of art, a topic of perennial interest to American dealers and collectors, is being hotly discussed again in the States owing to a curious case now pending in the Courts. Towards the end of July there arrived in New York Gainsborough's portrait of the Countess of Bristol, invoiced by Messrs. Agnew as possessing a value of £3094. This figure appears to have excited the suspicions of the custom house authorities, and the picture was sent to one of the Government's official valuers, "Appraiser" Fowler, who advanced the value to £4000. Subsequently inquiries were made in London, with the result that the painting was said to be worth "at least" £6000. Thereupon the case came before Judge Somerville for re-valuation, who, acting on the information received from London, advanced the value of the painting from £3094, the entered or invoice value, to £6000, approximately 100 per cent. Now as by United States law the seizure limit is only 50 per cent, the Government is entitled to seize the Gainsborough and hold it for rate unless a full board of three general appraisers reduces the increase made by Judge Somerville. This case will be of special interest to dealers in England, for more than one old-established firm has failed to effect a sale with American customers by refusing to invoice works of art at less than their real value, a practice which the average American collector regards as an ordinary business procedure.

Further light is shed on America's attitude towards art by an action which has roused the greatest indignation among artists and connoisseurs. The Art-Students League, a prominent New York society, was preparing to send out its usual illustrated catalogue of students' work, when the entire issue was seized by an agent of the "Society for the Suppression of Vice," who not merely alleged that the nude studies reproduced were "immoral," but caused the young lady acting as publisher to be arrested and imprisoned. She has now been released on bail, and if the society's case falls through her friends intend to take steps to punish the agent for her unjustifiable arrest. The leading artists and connoisseurs in the States are determined to "push the fight vigorously," for such actions, if upheld by law, would not only make figure painting an impossible profession for an American, but degrade the inhabitants of the States in the eyes of all civilised peoples who recognise the importance and sanctity of the art.

A few new acquisitions made by American galleries, if less sensational, are worthy to be mentioned. Of these the most important is the purchase for the Chicago Art Institute of El Greco's Assumption of the Virgin, a fine example of the master, which was originally in the Church of S. Domingo El Antigo in Toledo, whence it found its way through the hands of the Bourbon Prince to Messrs. Durand-Ruel's galleries in Paris, where it was on exhibition about eighteen months ago.

The Metropolitan Museum of New York has wisely decided to set aside a special room for new acquisitions—which may thus be seen without searching by regular visitors to the Museum—and among the works now on view there are Whistler's Woman in Grey, and three pictures by Monet and one by Pissarro, which Mr. Wm. Church Osborne has lent to the Museum. These are the first examples of French impressionist painting to be hung in the Museum, and they are existing much attention.

MUSIC

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS—II

AT the end of three weeks of Promenade Concerts a summary of their events may be taken as indicative of the general scheme adopted for the ten weeks season, although there are many good things to come, both among new and old works. In writing of the first night I described it as an old scene re-enacted, but the weeks which followed it have shown a distinctly new character in the programmes, the performances and the audiences. First, to summarise the programmes: although the official labels have disappeared, Monday night belongs, and will belong all through the season, to Wagner. We have had the usual popular selections, including on last Monday the Prelude to Parsifal and the "Charfreitagszauber" from the same. The only new one has been Miss Perceval Allen's singing of Isolde's "Erzählung an Brangäne," which had not been heard on a London concert platform before, and as a performance it was not particularly remarkable. The plan of grouping the Wagner excerpts into a programme by themselves, apart from the undeniable fact of their popularity, is probably a wise one, because we then settle down to receive a series of incomplete impressions, and can do better justice to them than when they are sandwiched in between finished works of art. At the same time I must confess to finding the Monday nights most unsatisfying musical fare, and it must be supposed that the lovers of them are of two kinds chiefly; those who know Wagner's works so well that a taste of his music lets them again into the enjoyment of whole scenes from his dramas, and those who know nothing about them whatsoever, but just take delight in the colour and glitter of the thing. To any one who has the rather old-fashioned habit of going to a concert simply to hear music, Monday night at the Promenades must be rather unsatisfactory.

The only other devoted night is Friday, which has become more strictly sacred to Beethoven than it was last year. This is such an unalloyed delight that I should be the last to wish to quarrel with the plan, especially as it does not exclude the overtures of Beethoven from the other nights; moreover, the plan seems thoroughly popular with the audience, the gaps which used to be apparent on Friday nights are there no longer. The "promenaders" stand as closely packed as on other nights, the corners of the balconies are well filled. Opposition to the reserved night principle, however, makes me doubt the wisdom of the Beethoven night, especially as personally I should so willingly think it a happy exception. The great benefit of these concerts is that they feed all worthy forms of musical taste, and a whole programme of Beethoven may be more than some can stand, while such occasional interpolations as we have had do not create the needed variety. By the time this appears in print, three symphonies will have been given, that is as far as the Eroica, but as this is necessarily written before the third Friday night, I can only remark on the good performances of the first two. They have, indeed, been good, though not perfect, the chief weakness being in the horns. The first was played better than the second, but the second was played in an atmosphere of such extreme heat that to listen was a severe physical difficulty, so what must it have been to play and to conduct! Two pianoforte Concertos have been given; the early "Mozartean" one in C major, gracefully played by Mr. Edward Isaacs, and the "Emperor," which Mr. York Bowen played very skilfully. These two placed in close conjunction are full of interest; the one is neat and carefully executed without any great utterance or even beauty that amounts to much more than classical elegance, while in the other, Beethoven wielded at the height of his manhood all the force gained in his student work, to express what was in him. The first movement seems to struggle for adequate expression, the second to attain it in its serene tenderness, while the last bursts into exulting triumph. These, with the two beautiful romances for violin and orchestra, the three "Leonora" overtures and a good many songs and arias from Fidelio, all of which were sung only indifferently, have so far made up the Beethoven programmes, while the remainder of the symphonies, the concertos and overtures are all to come.

The other four nights of the week are much less easily summed up, and this is the particular character of the present season. Years ago there was a definitely classical night, Tuesday, I think, which dealt with Mozart and Haydn, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Brahms; Wednesday was Tchaikovsky, while Thursday and Saturday were "popular," which then seemed to mean the same as second-rate. Then came the Strauss epidemic, and he seemed to invade almost every one's territory. At any rate, that classical night was happily lost. For why tell people that beautiful music which they can enjoy is classical? They naturally begin to think they cannot enjoy it. Now, instead, we have four nights filled with some form of interesting music, from Bach, whose suite in B minor for flute and strings and Brandenburg Concerto No. 2 have already been heard, onwards through a long line too numerous to be mentioned individually. A few of them have been Mozart's Concertante Symphony in E flat for violin and viola and his lovely symphony in E flat, No. 39; Mendelssohn's favourite scherzo from the Midsummer Night's Dream, and his piano concerto in G minor; Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Rosamunde Ballet; and Brahms's first symphony and two Hungarian Dances. A number of other composers, Weber, Berlioz, Dvořák, Humperdinck, and others are all most happily represented, not forgetting Strauss, whom, of course, no one could wish to be excluded. "Don Juan" and "Till Eulenspiegel" are the only two tone-poems of his yet heard, though "Don Quixote" and "Tod und Verklärung" are promised. Apparently "Ein Heldenleben" is not to be given. This cosmopolitan method of selecting the programmes is in reality the best way to help to form public taste. With the unnatural barriers between classic and modern removed, people have a better opportunity of comparing and learning to sift for themselves the wheat from the chaff. Of course it gives them plenty of chance for accepting chaff for wheat, but they very rarely fail to recognise the good grain when they get it, and the fact that now there are no half-empty nights is a good test of the success of the plan.

A word should be said about the new works, or works new to England, which have been already produced, although nothing very striking has appeared. A symphony in E flat by the Russian composer, Glière, was the most important; a clever piece of work showing more skill in using the material chosen than power of finding first-rate musical ideas. In other words Glière is no genius but a clever and enthusiastic composer. Next in interest stands Vaughan Williams's "Norfolk Rhapsody," and here the composer cannot be criticised in the same way because his material is all frankly stolen from the songs of Norfolk peasantry. However, he has made a really charming piece of music out of these folk-songs, and so the rhapsody is worth having. In the same concert a pleasing, if rather monotonous suite for oboe and strings by Fini Henriques was played. A programme piece, "Baba Jaga," by A. Liadoff shows a good deal of cleverness, but is not particularly good music, and Busoni's suite "Turandot" hardly sounded like music at all. If the "novelties" have not been of much importance the general course of the concerts has been extremely interesting and should be increasingly so, and the orchestral playing has been almost uniformly good. The brass is the least good section of the orchestra, and Mr. Wood seems to have but little realisation of its relation to the rest of the players. It is not only in fortissimo passages, but the defect is often more serious in delicate passages of orchestration, where a smudge of brass spoils the colouring. This is curious since Mr. Wood undoubtedly has a very nice sense for orchestral colour. In spite of this we have to thank him for many very fine performances of some of the most beautiful music ever written.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. GEORGE HARRAP and Company will issue simultaneously, in thirteen volumes, on or about October 15, the Complete Works of Shakespeare, reprinted from the First Folio and edited, with an introduction to each play, complete glossaries and variant readings, by Charlotte Porter and H. A. Clarke, with a general introduction by Professor Churton Collins. Omissions from the Folio of lines given in such single plays as were printed earlier, in quartos, are inserted between brackets. Words changed in the modern texts are given at the foot of the page, with the name of the first edition or editor making the change. Shakespeare's texts have been modernised to suit each succeeding epoch, and yet there is practically nothing in the form of the Folio which should cause the present-day reader any difficulty in reading it. Perhaps the only archaism which is not capable of giving pleasure to the ordinary reader is the old-fashioned form of the long s; the interchangeable i and j, u and v; an occasional y for th; and thē for them (an expedient commonly adopted by the master-printers of the period to equalise the spacing of the lines), and in these unimportant particulars only have the present editors taken any liberty with their texts. In all other respects they have set before the general reader, just as it stands, the only text that can claim to be the author's.

The index to the collected works of William Hazlitt edited by A. R. Waller and Arnold Glover, which has been in preparation since the completion of the twelfth volume, will be published shortly.

To the series of bibliographies of great American authors in special limited editions which Messrs. Constable commenced last year with the Bibliography of Nathaniel Hawthorne, they will add shortly a Bibliography of the Writings of James Russell Lowell, compiled by George Willis Cooke. The printing, as in the case of the Bibliography of Hawthorne, is on one side of the paper only, thus leaving each alternate page blank for any notes or comments which the owner may care to add. The edition will consist of five hundred and thirty numbered copies, of which five hundred will be for sale at twelve shillings net.

"King Arthur Pendragon" is the title of Mr. Arthur Dillon's forthcoming play, the tragic fable of which closely follows Malory. The book will be published early in the autumn by Mr. Elkin Matthews.

Messrs. Constable have in the press three collections of biographical studies. Mr. John Fyvie's "Comedy Queens of the Georgian Era" include Lavinia Fenton; Charlotte Clark; Catherine Clive; Margaret Woffington; George Anne Bellamy; Francis Abington; Sophia Baddeley; Elizabeth Farren; Mary Robinson; Mary Sumbel; Dora Jordan and Harriet Mellar. Mr. Lewis Melville, in "Victorian Novelists," devotes chapters to Bulwer Lytton; Disraeli; Douglas Jerrold; Samuel Lover; Thackeray; Charles Kingsley; Wilkie Collins; Charles Reade; Anthony Trollope; Whyte-Melville; Mrs. Gaskell; J. Sheridan Le Fanu; Henry Kingsley; Mrs. Oliphant; James Payn; Sir Walter Besant and William Black; and Mr. Leon H. Vincent, in "American Literary Masters," deals with Irving; Prescott; Whittier; Motley; Bryant; Emerson; Hawthorne; Parkman; Poe; Thoreau; Taylor; Bancroft; Longfellow; Holmes; Curtis; Mitchell; Lowell and Whitman.

Among the third fifty volumes of the "Everyman's Library," which Mr. Dent will publish on the 17th of this month we notice: Maurice's "Kingdom of Christ," complete in two volumes; Sir Thomas Browne's "Religio Medici"; the "Journal of John Wesley" in four volumes; Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter"; Washington Irving's "Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon"; Ford's "Gatherings from Spain" and Borrow's "Bible in Spain." A further twenty-one volumes of Scott's writings will be included, and these, with the four volumes previously issued form one of the cheapest complete editions of Scott obtainable.

Mr. John Lane will publish on September 11 a Portfolio of Aubrey Beardsley's drawings illustrating Oscar Wilde's "Salome." The artist's designs are here reproduced for the first time in the actual size of the originals, and are printed upon Japanese vellum. Included among them is a drawing originally executed as an illustration to "Salome" but not included in the volume when published. Mr. Lane promises two other volumes on the same day—"Stray Leaves," by Mr. Herbert Paul, and "The Secret Life: being the Book of a Heretic."

Messrs. Bell are about to add to Bohn's Standard Library a new edition of "The Arabian Nights Entertainments," edited by Stanley Lane-Poole. This edition contains "Ali Baba" and "Aladdin," which were not included in Lane's translation, and have been supplied by the Editor. Lane's voluminous notes have been omitted, only such shorter annotations being given as are necessary for the understanding of the text. The same publishers have in the press an edition of Coventry Patmore's poems in one volume, with an introduction by Basil Champneys, and an edition of his collected works—essays, etc.—in five volumes. One of the more important of their autumn announcements is "The Itinerary of John Leyland," newly edited from the manuscripts by Lucy Toulmin Smith. The edition is to be complete in four volumes, the first of which is almost ready. Messrs. Bell are adding to their series of "Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture," a volume on "Van Dyck," by Lionel Cust, and in the York Library they will reprint Burton's "Pilgrimage to al-Madinah and Meccah," edited by Lady Burton (in two volumes); George Eliot's "Adam Bede," Fielding's "Joseph Andrews" and "Amelia," and Trollope's Barsetshire Novels.

Mr. Albert B. Lloyd, whose book "In Dwarf-land and Cannibal Country" attracted some attention a few years ago, has now written a new work entitled "Uganda to Khartoum—Life and Adventure on the Upper Nile." It will be published by Mr. Unwin on September 20. The author gives a record of travel and adventure during five years spent in a little known region of Central Africa—the Northern Provinces of the Uganda Protectorate. "A Short History of Jewish Literature," by Mr. Israel Abrahams, Reader in Rabbinic Literature in the University of Cambridge, will be published by Mr. Unwin on the same date. The volume gives a general survey of the literary products of the Jews from the fall of Jerusalem to the age of Moses Mendelssohn. It deals, in a general way, with the Talmud, the mediæval poetry, the mystical Kabbala and other great topics. Two chapters treat of the Diffusion of Science and the Diffusion of Folk-tales, and the function of the Jews as literary intermediaries between East and West is dealt with.

A third book on "Beauties" is announced. Miss Mary Craven's "Famous Beauties of Two Reigns" will be published next month by Mr. Eveleigh Nash. The work will contain a chapter on "Fashion in Femininity," by Major Martin Hume, and will be illustrated by twenty-one photogravure portraits of beautiful women: Maria and Elizabeth Gunning; Jane, Duchess of Gordon; Louise de Keroualle; the beautiful Duchess of Devonshire; Barbara Cleveland; Elizabeth Lindley, the Maid of Bath; Mary Robinson ("Perdita"); Mrs. Abington; Anne Damer; and Molly Lepell. We understand that Miss Craven's book was to have been published last year, and that her title was chosen before the announcement of the other two books.

Mr. Bram Stoker's "Personal Reminiscences of Sir Henry Irving," will be published by Mr. Heinemann in two large volumes on October 13—the anniversary of Irving's death.

There is to be a new departure in the publication of The North American Review. It will in future be published twice a month, and the published price instead of being 2s. 6d. monthly will be 1s. fortnightly. The North American Review has been continuously published for ninety-one years. The first of the September numbers has a varied and interesting list of contents; among other articles will be found a chapter of "Mark Twain's Autobiography." Mr. W. H. Mallock discusses "Great Fortunes and the Community." Professor Goldwin Smith writes on the "British Empire in India," and there is an article entitled "Mr. Roosevelt's Moral Right to be a Candidate for the Presidency," the author of which writes under the pseudonym of "Q."

In connection with the quarter-centenary celebration of the University of Aberdeen this month four commemorative volumes will be issued immediately. All Universities or institutions of University rank that send delegates will be presented with one or more of these volumes. The four books are: "The Roll of Graduates of the University of Aberdeen 1860 to 1900," with brief biographical notices by Colonel William Johnston; "Studies in the History and Development of the University of Aberdeen," edited by P. J. Anderson; "Studies in the History and Art of the Eastern Provinces of the Roman Empire," edited by Professor W. M. Ramsay; and "Studies in Pathology," written by Alumni to celebrate the Quarter-Centenary of the Chair of Pathology. There have also been officially prepared a "Handbook to the City and University," a "Programme of the Celebrations," and "Life at a Northern University," by Neil N. Maclean, revised and annotated by Mr. W. Keith Leask.

"North Devon" is the title of a new volume to be published in Messrs. Black's smaller series of colour books. The book is written by Mr. F. J. Snell and is illustrated with reproductions of water-colour drawings. Mr. Walter Del Mar is about to publish with Messrs. Black another travel book entitled "The Romantic East." It describes a tour in Burma, whose people are perhaps the least spoiled of all oriental races by contact with the West.

A Carlyle letter hitherto unpublished has just come into the hands of Mr. Hay Hunter of John Knox's house, Edinburgh, and will be issued very soon with elucidatory notes.

CORRESPONDENCE

LIKE AS A CONJUNCTION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have consulted the Oxford Dictionary, and I grieve to say that several recent writers of repute have used "like" in the way I denounced as atrocious. These writers are Southey, Darwin, Maudesley, Bonamy-Price, W. Morris, J. C. Morison, J. K. Jerome. It is lamentable to see that such a slovenly expression is working its way into (perhaps I should say, maintaining its place in) English literature. But it is comforting to me to find that the writer of the article in the Oxford Dictionary regards the phrase just as I do. He describes "like" as adj., adv. (conj.) and sb. (as in "we ne'er shall look upon his like again"); also as adv. (quasi-prep., conj.). When he comes to the usage last mentioned, he proceeds thus:

"Used as conj. = 'likeas, as': now generally considered as vulgar or slovenly, though examples may be found in many recent writers of standing."

All the quotations made by Dr. Furnivall would be called by him adjectives or adverbs or apparent (but not real) conjunctions. "Like" is used as a real conj. only in phrases such as "like I did," when the verb is expressed. There are undoubted instances in the writers mentioned above of this usage, which Dr. Henry Bradley agrees with me in describing as vulgar or slovenly. But I do not think that a lapse on the part of these writers avails to defend the use of "like" as a conj. It is to be regretted that they have been guilty of this solecism, which is as distasteful to Dr. Bradley as it is to me. As the epithet "atrocious" seems to offend Dr. Furnivall I will substitute for it "deplorable."

I should be sorry to offend Dr. Furnivall, whose services to English literature I gladly acknowledge. I hope I have not been guilty of any want of respect for him. His tone towards me has not been conciliatory, to describe it in the mildest fashion. However, I find on consulting "Who's Who" that Dr. Furnivall has been distinguished throughout his long life as a sculler and boat-builder—which may account for the vein of "shiver-my-timbers" (if I may so describe it) which runs through his correspondence.

I still think with Dr. Bradley that "like I did" is a vulgarism, but in deference to the weighty authority of Dr. Furnivall I am willing to speak of it as "deplorable," and to withdraw the epithet "atrocious."

The Oxford Dictionary does not quote any instance of "like" as a conj. from Shelley, but I am ready to take Dr. Furnivall's word that he too has fallen from grace. Nothing could be easier than to prove by quotations from recent literature that such a phrase as "whom he said was his brother" is legitimate. Many "vile phrases" are creeping into our literature, and apparently if a goodly number of solecisms can be quoted, the solecism becomes an accepted usage, even though the sponsors for it be persons whose reputation does not rest on literary faculty, but on faculties quite disparate from literature.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

GRAMMAR AND SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The controversy between Professor Tyrrell and Dr. Furnivall is an admirable instance of the controversy between the à priori grammarians of the Lindley Murray and Vaugelos type and the more scientific historical school. Whenever these "pure reason" grammarians come across an instance they cannot explain (from imperfect historical training in their own tongue), they either declare it a monstrosity, or if it be too firmly imbedded in the language it is catalogued as an idiom (or as the older French grammarians said a Gallicism), one of those expressions which like the word mystery in theological language has apparently been given in the Talleyrand sense to conceal not thought but impotence of thought and really means that the logician has come to the end of his tether. The older grammars in English and French teem with explanations which historical research has proved to be futile and untrue. Nor are the modern ones free from faults. What could have been more funny for instance than the unhistorical description of the apparent absence of the "e" in "grand" mère," and similar words, in which the apostrophe for which no doubt your dogmatic grammarian would fight to the death represents as a schoolboy once sagely wrote, "the omission of an 'e' mute which was never there." "Like I did" no doubt shocks the Latin scholar with his subconscious "similis," only used as an adjective. He can't swallow the "as" understood. Yet a much more glaring "Abfall" from his beloved classical usages is the omission of the relative in such phrases as "the man I saw yesterday." As he can't upset the usage he does his best to discredit it by insisting that the relative is inserted when "polite" English is written. Another usage he has been able to curtail to a certain extent is the position of the preposition at the end of the clause or sentence, i.e., the man whom I gave it to has gone away. Apart from the question of rhythm and clearness, its position at the end seems to me quite justifiable on Teutonic lines. The truth is your rhetorician pure and simple adopts a sort of ignorant game-keeper attitude towards language. Any rare or to him unknown form he attempts to destroy like so much vermin, although it may be in keeping with the most ancient and enduring traditions of the language. How long shall we allow these ultramontane scholars to crucify our native tongue on the cross of classical idiom? As long, I suppose, as we do not insist that our native tongue is and shall be the basic language for all linguistic study.

Curiously enough the other controversy you are reviving, that on spelling reform, is also a struggle between the genteel dogmatist and the modern scientific school. To the dispassionate what can seem more ridiculous than sacrificing the claims of the young to the exigencies of the old? Better that ten generations should be taught on wrong lines than that the present generation should have to go to school again! The mere fact that reading is now largely taught phonetically and would be still more so if it were not for our preposterous spelling shows that the phonetic method is the natural method. The more serious difficulties of writing would be immensely reduced by the introduction of a phonetic spelling. I reckon the difficulties connected with dialects, but I ask the simple question: Are we more likely to improve defects in pronunciation in teachers as well as in taught with our present chaotic spelling or with a definite official orthography? Germany, or rather Prussia, has on one or two occasions at least reformed its spelling with a view to making it more nearly phonetic, and all German journalists and novelists have adopted the reforms. If Germans, in spite of their differences of dialect, can succeed in establishing a spelling that is largely phonetic, why cannot we whose differences of pronunciation are not greater than those in Germany, make at least a start towards arriving at a similar desirable state of things? No one proposes to be able to form an absolutely perfect phonetic spelling, but the business and common-sense attitude seems to be that the nearer you can get to it without unduly complicating your symbols, the better. You reduce proportionately the labours of the children. Moreover the easier the symbolism is, the quicker are they likely to arrive at the thought and spirit contained in print—which is the true end of reading. What seems so ridiculous is that these dogmatic spellers do not realise that the spelling they are so ardently defending is for the great part the crude philological product of ignorant seventeenth- and eighteenth century printers and printer's devils. One might call the champion not inaptly advocati diaboli.

One word in conclusion. The present attempt at spelling reform in America is not, as is apparently held over here, an ill-considered movement that has been suddenly sprung on the world. It is the result, or rather continuation, of the labours of a committee appointed several years ago by the National Education Association to consider and report on spelling reform. The Association contains many thousand members and embraces all degrees of education from the common school to the University. Its suggested reforms have long been adopted as the official spelling of the Educational Review, the leading educational paper in America.

To those who care for the aesthetic and thought content of language, this rumpus over what Montaigne has happily called the "brussailles et épines" of language can only afford exquisite amusement. They will remember that thorns and thistles are the pet pabulum of a class of animals whose dura òlia are especially constructed to appreciate such forbidding delicacies. The scholar as scholar must doubtless have his manuscript and incunabula, but life is too short for the general multitude to serve an apprenticeship for this kind of thing. Moreover, I strongly suspect that it should come not at the beginning, but at the end of the training, after the novice has been initiated into the spirit of literature, for then only can he appreciate the beauty or quaintness of the setting. The study of pictures should precede the study of picture frames, or at least not be anticipated by it.

ARISTOTLE AND THE MODERN READER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not know that Mr. Marshall's letter in your issue of September 1 requires any answer from me. Perhaps, however, I may be allowed to say a word or two in acknowledgment of it.

I accept his statement that he had no intention of criticising unfavourably the doctrine of the Mean: and I think he is right in his suggestion that it is over what constitutes a "sympathetic" interpretation of Aristotle that we differ. Possibly also he is right in saying that that is a matter of temperament. For myself, certainly I cannot isolate Aristotle's Ethical formulæ from his general metaphysical teaching. Few thinkers, it seems to me, have more consistently put the whole of their thinking into their treatment of individual problems. As regards the passage from the Phædo, I am not concerned to deny that a note of contempt pervades it. What I do maintain is that Mr. Marshall misinterprets the passage when he describes it as a "protest against moderation." The contempt connects with the words ἀνὴρ φιλοσοφίας καὶ νοῦ, not with the word μετρίως.

As for the doctrine of the Practical Syllogism, there is not perhaps any very serious difference between Mr. Marshall and myself. I value it chiefly as a psychological analysis which reveals reason in any action which can deserve the name of conduct: Mr. Marshall apparently values it mainly as giving some account of the phenomenon of ἀκρασία. My contention, however, was that such value as the analysis has is not weakened, as Mr. Marshall holds it is, by the fact that the term ἀκρασία is practically confined to cases in which a man's better judgment is overpowered by desire. And to that I adhere. At the same time I am quite at one with Mr. Marshall when he says that it is no easy matter to find a single word which adequately renders ἀκρασία. I only refuse to admit that that justifies him in using a word which is actually misleading—as "irresolution" seems to me to be. For myself I should prefer even the conventional "incontinence" to that. In conclusion I would only say that it is incidental to criticism that points of difference should emerge, and catch the emphasis. They are, however, in no way inconsistent with wide levels of general appreciation and agreement.

YOUR REVIEWER.

SIMPLIFIED SPELLING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Many thanks for the "Notes" on Speling, and for an open door into your correspondens colum.

It appeerz that the formashon ov partisipl ov "kil" prezents sum difficulty. It iz inferd that the speling wud be spelt "kilt." This iz not so. The obvius form iz "kild."

Exsepshon iz taken to "woz" for was; the implicashon that "wuz" iz much neerer to the sound. I have no objecshons to "wuz." It iz not emplyd fonetically in Nuttall's, Chambers', nor in the Century Dictionary; and adopt "woz"; and aul fonetishanz doo so. It iz interesting to lern that "larf" and "corf" are truer fonetic formz than "laf" and "cof," for laugh and cough. I can understand the use ov "r" in "larf," the hard sound ov "aa" or "ah," being so much like "r"; but its susted prezens in "cof" (corf) iz newz to me. It iz another proof ov the need for a fonetic alfabet for scientific purposes, which several eminent authoritez in the University ov Boston ar dezirus ov establishing by meenz ov an Internashonal Conferens. The project haz reseeded the aprooval ov over six hundred scolastic authoritez thruout the world, and this fact further shoez that Boston culture iz not absolutely opozed to Simplified Speling—az stated in the Pres.

I am glad yeu ar dispozed to poke fun and make us laf at ourselvz, even tho the foundashon iz scarsely justified. It iz questionable whether Beaumont or Fletcher wud object to yeur satirical orthograpy.

It iz pleezing to obzerv that yeu, along with the Times, Daily Chronicle, Westminster Gazette, etc., aproov of a commishon of scholarz ov both countriez being convened to discuss the question. Let us hope that it iz not too late to hav the comon sens ov the best authoritez.

I hartily suport Mr. Robert Bridges' practical propozishons. Had such a propozal been adopted yeez ago yeu wud not hav had cauz to complain ov whot yeu term "outrajous examplz ov the wurst kind." I prezume a picture ov my orthograpy. Archbishop Whately warn'd us yeez ago ov the results ov a continued and stubborn conservatism.

I beg to suesthat Mr. Algernon Ashton reed the works ov Tennyson, Walter Savage Landor, Milton, and Shakespear (the too latter in the orijinal or Oxford reprints), and report whether or not theez poets uzd "t" insted ov "ed" to form the sharp preterits. Perhaps the venerabl Prof. Furnivall (or to be more refined I shud hav said "a certain" Prof. Furnivall) had beter look to hiz laurelz.

It iz interesting to no the sex ov F. Mayhew, hensforth Mis (or Mrs. ?) Mayhew. I shud hav been further interested in lerning whether the etimology ov wurdz woz unasertainabl in Chaucer's, Shakespear's and Milton's day. Evazhon iz not argument. I hav no dezire to lern, and privately never wil spel according to the fashon implied by yeur lady correspondent's note. It iz an outrage on reezon and comon sens.

Is it not a reflexhon upon us when we contrast our childish feerz consarning the modificashon ov the dres ov a few wurdz with the boldness ov the propozal ov sertain Japaneez to adopt the Roman alfabet? It iz within the ranje ov practical orthograpies that our alliez wil discard their cumbrus silabariez before we adopt adequate modificalshonz in our speling.

The Times truly remarks "that ther iz no sens and very litl sistem in the accepted uzaje ov English orthograpy"; and "the chanjes now propozed (to be adopted by Mr. Roosevelt) doo not seem for the most part to be very formidabl or very startling." Prof. Skeat sayz: "The objecshonz to speling reform cum, not from those hoo ar wel acquainted with the history ov the langwaje, but from the noizy and the ignorant." And Dr. Sweet deliverz this blo: "The old fallasy that fonetic speling destroyz etimology and the history ov the langwaje . . . iz a monstus absurdity both from a sientific and a practical point ov vew."

H. DRUMMOND.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Liberty in spelling like liberty in uthr matters is possible to those willing to pay the cost. This may be another way of suggesting that liberty does not exist; and that the term is of specious mintage.

F. J. Furnivall has manifested (in his contribution on "like" as a conjunction) the possession by him of the curage and sense—please do not regard this as patronage—required to shake off the shackles of the Coward Majority.

Robert Bridges preaches pleasingly; practice has a keener edge,

No, please do not let us enforce change, gradual or uthr; let us rather effect a change in our own spelling according to our own whim.—Don't be in a too violent hurry,—yes, it wil probably lead to sum inconvenience; but that is a lesser evil from the point of vew of practical education than the 'abject submission to arbitrarily constituted authority which is so prominent a feature in modern educational institutions, more particularly of the elementary grade.

It wil mark an epock in national education when children realise that "give" is not a sensible spelling even if "teacher says so,"

"THE ENGLISH DIALECT DICTIONARY"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be allowed in your columns to make some observations on the article in the "English Dialect Dictionary," which deals with the various words which are supposed to be identical with the northern word "rean." This word generally has the meaning of a strip of uncultivated ground round an arable field, and is said in the dictionary to be of Icelandic origin, being identical with Old Norse rein a strip of land. In the same section (No. 1) which has this definition of a balk in a field we find cited on Irish form, namely, "raheen," for which a passage in the "Folk-Lore Record" is given as the authority: "Trees in the raths, raheens, and such early structures cannot be cut without bring ill-luck to the occupier of the field." Now it is quite certain that this Irish "raheen" has no connection whatever with the North-country "rean" meaning a balk.

For "raheen" is a genuine Irish word, being simply an English way of writing raithin the Irish diminutive of rath which means a mound, earthwork or fort, so that the "raheen" of the "Folk-Lore Record" means a small fort. We may see from the "Postal Guide" that "Raheen" occurs as the name of a village in Co. Wexford, and that "Rath" is to be found as an element in many place-names in Ireland, as in Rathdrum, Rathmore, Rathmoyle. It may be noted that the form "raheen" appears in another article in E.D.D. (s.v. Rath) where the passage from the "Folk-Lore Record" had been previously cited.

Under this article "rean" we also find a west-country "reen" a small stream, also a Cornish "reen" a steep hillside. It would have been more in accordance with the plan of the dictionary to have treated the North-Country "rean" separately as the three other words have nothing whatever to do with it or with one another.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We are at last getting forrarder with regard to the Sonnets.

Boaden, Tyler, Dowden, Wyndham, Archer, and other critics will have it that the sonnets were addressed to the Earl of Pembroke; while Massey and Sidney Lee insist that the addressee was the Earl of Southampton. The last-named critic says: "The Pembroke theory, whose adherents have dwindled of late, will henceforth be relegated, I trust, to the category of popular delusions." ["Life of Shakespeare," p. 406.]

Your correspondent "E.M.C." comes forward with what he considers a new theory that the Sonnets were written by Shakespeare "on commission for somebody else," Shakespeare receiving "a few pounds for the work."

This theory rather fits in with Pope's couplet on the dramatist, that he

For gain not glory winged his roving flight,
And grew immortal in his own despite.

But, again, was it not Wordsworth who wrote—

Scorn not the Sonnet; critic, you have frowned, Mindless of its just honours. With this key Shakespeare unlocked his heart.

THE FUTURE LIFE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Assuredly Saint Paul would have been greatly surprised to learn that he had "fairly given away his case" because such a passage as 2 Cor. i. 8-10 was superficially inconsistent with his confident and exultant faith in a future life. He might have replied as I should reply in the words of a great thinker; "Das Gefühl richtet sich nicht nach der Logik." Such an inconsistency differs toto calo from the fatal inconsistency of Homer in the Odyssey or of Virgil in the Sixth Aeneid. The inconsistency admits of another explanation than R.S.Y.'s. The very confidence in the Christian Doctrine of a future life invests the fact of death with a more solemn and awful significance than it could have possessed for the classical or oriental authors to whom I have referred. The words of Ruskin about Greek and Christian Art seem to me to apply, mutatis mutandis, to the distinction between the two literatures: "All the nobleness, as well as the faults, of the Greek Art were dependent on its making the most of this present life: its dominion was in this world. Florentine Art was essentially . . . expectant of a better world, and antagonistic, therefore to the Greek temper." For this reason no classical parallels can be adduced to the passages which I have quoted. For this reason it is inconceivable that any Greek or Latin poet should have written such poems as Dante's "Paradiso," Milton's "Paradise Lost," Corneille's "Polyeucte," Goethe's "Faust," Cowper's "Winter's Walk at Noon," Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and Browning's "Pope" in "the Ring and the Book." For this reason it is not a question of the number of passages, as R.S.Y. assumes, but the intensity of conviction that breathes through them. For this reason Kant's assured belief in a future life differs not only in degree, but in kind from Plato's and Cicero's. For this reason there is nothing in Saint Simon like Tacitus's famous "Si quis piorum manibus locus." What an unfathomable depth of pathos underlies that "Si quis"! For this reason there is nothing in all the letters of Cicero like these words of a letter written by the celebrated author of "Télémaque": "quoique je l'aie pleuré amèrement, je ne puis croire que je l'aie perdu. O qu'il y a de réalité dans cette société intime! Encore un peu et il n'y aura plus de quoi pleurer. C'est nous qui mourons: ce que nous aimons vit, et ne mourra plus."

Having said this much, I am content to leave my case to the judgment of such of your readers as are interested in this question.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

P.S.—"A Constant Reader" will find the lines which I quoted from Collins (John, not William) in the "Golden Treasury" near the end of Book 3. May I commend to his notice Palgrave's note upon the poem?

"CHILDREN OF FAR CATHAY"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Being assured of the generous spirit of the person who reviewed my book, "Children of Far Cathay," in your last issue; and being at the same time painfully conscious of the many glaring imperfections of my own writing, I will pass over his strictures without comment—regarding them as the righteous indignation of a superior intellect. But with regard to the "Extract from a literary journal printed on the front page of the book," against which the said reviewer brings to bear all the ponderous machinery of his wit, I should like to say that the paragraph was inserted without my consent or knowledge, and that directly its inclusion was noticed by me, I wrote a letter of protest to my publisher.

Trusting you will kindly endeavour to find space for these few lines in your esteemed columns, and thanking you in anticipation,

CHAS. J. H. HALCOMBE.

Herne Bay, Kent, Sept. 3.

[We sympathise with Mr. Halcombe; and, the facts being as they are, regret that we should have called attention to an unfortunate error of taste for which he was not responsible.—ED.]

NOT ALGY—BUT ANOTHER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—For some time past a weekly journal called London Opinion has been publishing articles, headed "The Letters of Algy," and it has since come to my knowledge that many people are imagining that these "Letters" are being written by me! I therefore think it necessary to declare, once and for all, that I have nothing whatever to do with these articles, but cannot at the same time withhold my surprise how it was possible for anybody to think that such meaningless and nonsensical stuff as these so-called "Letters" constitute could ever have emanated from my pen.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-edged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

LOVE AMONG THE CHICKENS

By P. G. WODEHOUSE

Illustrated by H. M. BROCK

This is a Delightfully Humorous Novel dealing with the escapades of an Amateur Poultry Farmer, while incidentally presenting a charming Love Story.

THE SCOTSMAN says:

"The story is so happy and refreshing that no holiday-making person who has time upon his hands will begin it without finishing it at a sitting."

THE TRIBUNE says:

"Mr. Wodehouse has written an entertaining story for the holiday moments . . . There is an exuberance of high spirits in 'Love Among the Chickens.'"

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS take pleasure in announcing

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS

These Plates are the product of a new method which ensures absolute fidelity in the rendering of form, and a presentation of the colour of the originals such as has heretofore seemed impossible of realisation. No "screen," regular or irregular, such as spoils the majority of modern reproductions; no "grain" from lithographic stones; no arbitrary engraver's "hatching," "line," or "stipple"; and finally, no "glaze" or "coating" on the paper used, mar these prints. The publishers believe that what photography has done for the student of form, these prints will do for the student and lover of form and colour. The delicate adaptability of the medium employed is such that, for example, a reproduction of a fresco by LUINI seems veritably a fresco in surface; the plate after LEONARDO's cartoon in the Brera almost appears an original water-colour. The Publishers will send a full Prospectus and Note upon the Medici Prints upon application. They have arranged to facilitate personal inspection anywhere within the United Kingdom. Applications through your bookseller or print-seller are invited.

The First Issue will consist of Three Plates never before, to the Publishers' knowledge, reproduced in Colour:

i. BERNARDINO LUINI: 1475(?) - 1533

HEAD OF THE VIRGIN MARY, after the Fresco now in the Brera Palace, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 10½ inches.) 10s. 6d. net.

ii. LEONARDO DA VINCI: 1452 - 1519

HEAD OF THE CHRIST, after the unfinished Cartoon now in the Brera Palace, Milan.

(Size of Plate, 27 by 19 inches; Colour Surface, 13½ by 10½ inches.) 10s. 6d. net.

iii. ALESSANDRO FILIPEPI, called BOTTICELLI: 1447 - 1510

THE VIRGIN AND CHILD, Painting in tempera on wooden panel now in the Museo-Poldi Pezzoli at Milan.

THE LITERARY WEEK

A LONG letter addressed to the Editor of the Times by Mr. Charles William Wallace, of the University of Nebraska, will whet the appetite of all students of our early drama. Mr. Wallace has spent some time digging in our muniment rooms for papers concerned with the Elizabethan stage, and last October he published three documents in a Chancery suit in which Shakespeare was one of the plaintiffs. Now he announces fresh discoveries which affect the Blackfriars Theatre.

The Blackfriars Theatre stood in Play-house Yard, Blackfriars, and its entrance was almost exactly on the site of the entrance to the publishing office of the Times. Much of that quarter had been occupied, until the dissolution of the monasteries, by the Dominicans or black friars, and out of their buildings the Blackfriars Theatre was made in 1596 by James Burbage, the actor-manager and builder of the first London playhouse, The Theatre, in Finsbury Fields. Previous to that, the building had been used for court revels and masques under Sir Thomas Cawarden, the first Master of the Revels, to whom Edward VI. presented in 1550 a great part of the precincts of the monastery. Sir Thomas turned his property into a fashionable residential quarter. Here lived Henry Lord Hunsdon, his son Sir George Carey, his successor in the title, in the office of Chamberlain, and in the patronage of the theatrical company known (among several other titles at different times) as the Lord Chamberlain's, of which Shakespeare was a member, and Richard Burbage, the son of James, the chief. The gate of George Lord Hunsdon's mansion adjoined one of the entrances to the theatre. Here, too, lived Lord Cobham, once Lord Chamberlain, the Blackwells, the Bacons and other great people. Here, too, were tennis-courts, as Mr. Greenstreet's discoveries proved.

There was the usual protest to the Privy Council against Burbage's action, and the usual neglect of it. At any rate James Burbage constructed his theatre, only to die before he could use it. It was then leased to one Henry Evans, the master of the Children of the Chapel, the Company of boy-actors which included Nathaniel Field, Underwood, Ostler and others, and this company held it till 1608, when, business having fallen off, Evans induced Richard Burbage, the son of James, to take it off his hands. The agreement under which Evans held it is among Mr. Wallace's discoveries.

During his tenancy, the Blackfriars became notorious. The passage in Hamlet in which Rosencrantz tells the prince about the "aery of children," who were "most tyrannically clapped," is familiar to all. The passage is only a part of a famous quarrel begun between Ben Jonson on one side and Dekker and Marston on the other. It was by the children at the Blackfriars that Jonson's Cynthia's Revels and The Poetaster, both swashing blows in the battle, were produced; and it is not impossible that Shakespeare, wishing to strike a blow for his own company, attacked, either in Troilus and Cressida or elsewhere, Jonson, who wrote for the rival company under Henslowe and Alleyne.

In 1608, when Henry Evans gave it up, the Blackfriars theatre was used with the Globe by the company of which Shakespeare was a member; here Shakespeare acted, and here, it is possible, were acted some of his plays written after that date. The Blackfriars was a "private" theatre; and though in practice that meant little difference from a public theatre, there can be no doubt that James Burbage intended it to be a select house for the use of the rich people living round it. It had a lead roof (whereas the "public" theatres were open to the sky), and having purchased it at what his sons afterwards called "extreme rates," he "made it into a playhouse with great change and trouble." How fine a place it was, Mr. Wallace's discoveries will help to show. His documents give its exact dimensions (which were about half the size of the Globe) and the details of its construction and uses. It would be interesting if they also revealed exactly who held the theatre between its completion and its lease to Evans in 1600. So do scholars and students knock new nails into the coffin of Collier's forgeries.

In another column we notice the new English Hymnal, issued by the Oxford University Press. It is, as our reviewer points out, a well-compiled work; but when are we to have an adequate Hymnal, constructed not for use in churches, but merely for reading, study and delight? It would need to be limited, with rigorous exactness, to the all-enduring products of the genius of the English-speaking race, at its highest level of religious insight, and also to be full of artistic beauty; a book which the broadest of broad-churchmen would value and even agnostics could appreciate, while the religious-minded of every sect might care for it. There is room for such an Anthology of Praise that would eclipse every "golden treasury" extant; but it would need to be so edited that all inferior work was rigorously excluded, and only the choicest products of the imagination included. It is an "open secret" that such an anthology exists, but has not yet seen the light. Publishers seem to think that there is no market for it, while there is a large one for inferior and commonplace books.

The proposed Public Library Omnibus Bill, although not finally presented to the Library Association Conference at Bradford, was circulated there in printed form and formally approved. The object of the Bill is the removal of the rate limitation, although the actual levying of the rate and the determination of the amount would necessarily rest with the local authority. There are thirty richer towns in which the limit of a penny in the pound has been removed at great cost by means of special acts. The poorer districts are unable to take this course (Mr. Abbott, Manchester). The extension of the Acts to Country Areas is another object of the Bill. Effect could be given to the Acts by means of travelling libraries, or the schools might be utilised. And no county library rate would be levied on those districts already levying a rate for the support of a public library (Mr. H. W. Fovargue, Town Clerk, Eastbourne, Hon. Solicitor to the Association). It is difficult to understand why the inhabitants of one part of a county should have fewer means and opportunities of culture merely because they are less in number than those of a neighbouring area. An important feature is the proposal to establish collections of county literature in the county towns.

The third item of the Bill provides for the exception of public libraries from local rates. As the preamble of the Bill states, there was always the impression, until the recent adverse decision, that in ordinary circumstances a public library was exempted. We believe it has been stated that this last clause is unnecessary, if the removal of the "penny limit" is accepted. But it is obvious that it might be exceedingly difficult to obtain a higher rate than that already levied, in some districts; while all those smaller libraries, some of which were vindictively assessed at a high amount would be at once relieved. The full text of the Bill will be printed in the "Library Association Record."

A Central London Lending Library is a pleasing picture conjured up by a paper on "the present position of London Municipal Libraries." (Mr. J. McKillop, London.) There are striking inequalities in the product of the rate compared with the number of the inhabitants; as much as £120 per thousand might be raised in Westminster while Stepney can only raise £19 per thousand. Students are unable to obtain access to works too expensive for many libraries and yet essential to study. And those who are able to study only in the early morning or the late evening are severely handicapped, as the greater libraries, such as the British Museum, are not then open. The suggested scheme provides for the formation of a central collection of more expensive and less used works which would be on loan to the various municipal and other libraries for lending out to their readers, and might be housed in the new buildings of the London County Council. The initial expenditure is estimated at £60,000 spread over ten years; and the annual charge at about £5000 after the first four or five years. We understand that the paper will appear in an extended form in an early number of the Nineteenth Century.

Some misconception appeared to exist at the Conference with regard to our remarks in a recent number on the establishment of a central authority. In the present state of opinion with regard to the government of London it would be rash to say that the London County Council will long remain the central authority for London. It was not to London alone that we referred but to the whole of the country. It would be the realisation of the dream of many librarians to see a governmental library department with powers at least equal to those possessed by the Board of Education.

The co-operative code of rules for catalogue, which has been under the consideration of committees of the Library Association and of the American Library Association for upwards of three years, has now reached a satisfactory conclusion. The Library Association Committee was voted powers "to go to press" at the Conference, and it is anticipated that the work will be published some time before the end of the year. The code is founded on the draft scheme submitted at the Newcastle Conference. Close classification of books was recommended as an aid to study in "The Development of Classification" (Mr. E. A. Savage, Wallasey). Form classification and alphabetical classification are encroaching upon and undermining rational classification. A close classification of poetry, the drama, and fiction in periods in the various languages would show the development of the literature of the different countries.

A history of the educational work of the Library Association was given in the first paper on "The Education of the Librarian" (Mr. H. D. Roberts, Brighton, late Hon. Secretary of the Education Committee). A good general education was recommended as a sine qua non of admission to a public library staff, and promotion should only proceed as the various sections of the profession examination were passed. The enormous increase in the number of assistants presenting themselves for examination shows that there is a steady tendency on their part to keep pace. The technical classes at the London School of Economics and the correspondence classes of the Association are invaluable to those assistants entering for statistics and the diploma. An examination syllabus of three grades was suggested in the second paper on the subject (Mr. E. A. Baker, Woolwich, Secretary of the Education Committee). This syllabus embraced most of the subjects of the examination for the degree of B.A. in addition to the purely technical subjects. The grades were elementary, advanced, and the examination for the diploma, instead of the single grade at present in force.

We have received—from what source it is not stated—a leaflet protesting against the exclusion of newspapers from the new Public Libraries at Islington. It is a protest with which we have no sympathy. After personally inspecting the new North Branch Library at Islington—which is to be opened this month—we are in a position to state that the magazine room is remarkably well equipped with weekly and monthly papers; and we believe that advertisements of situations vacant, etc., are to be posted somewhere in the building. It appears to us that the purposes of a public library are misunderstood when the ratepayers' money is expended on penny and halfpenny papers which every reader can afford to buy for himself and read at home; and the liberal provision of weekly and monthly papers can leave no cause of complaint open to those who wish to use the institution as a club.

The educational plans of Toynbee Hall for the session 1906-7, which opens on October 1, have just been issued. The University Extension Courses include lectures by Dr. Rickett on English Social Reformers from William Langland and John Ball to Ruskin and Morris, and by Mr. J. A. Hobson on The Making and Sharing of Wealth. Another course of lectures will be delivered by Mr. C. W. A. Tait on The Development of British Rule in India. There are also classes in Nature Study, Physiology, English and Foreign Literature, and many other subjects. The syllabus also contains details of the Public Debates, Concerts and Popular Lectures which are held at Toynbee Hall, and to which admission is free. The Annual Convocation will be held on Saturday, September 29, and new students may obtain a card of admission on application to Mr. J. H. Whitehouse, the Secretary of Toynbee Hall.

LITERATURE

THE BONDS OF FATE

Prisoners. By MARY CHOLMONDELEY. (Hutchinson, 6s.)

SORROW, passion, remorse and regret are the materials out of which Miss Cholmondeley has woven her new romance. She calls it "Prisoners," no doubt having in her mind a liturgical reference to the fact that we are all in a way prisoners and captives. As though to give warning that her book is not to be a joyful one, it begins with the marriage bells that usually sound at the end of a novel, and these marriage bells are themselves the emblem of a captivity. They signalise the marriage of a young English lady to an Italian duke. He is considerably older than his bride, and, although on both sides there is plenty of goodwill and admiration, love in the usual sense does not exist. It speedily comes to the young wife, however, when in Italy she meets with one who had been a sweetheart of her youthful days. He is a man of the most absolute honour, and no sooner discovers what their mutual feelings are than he resolves to leave her for ever. But the weak, selfish and sentimental young wife will not allow this to take place without a farewell meeting, and makes an assignation with him. In the midst of their tender, fond farewells a great alarm is raised, and to save her reputation he hides behind a screen. However, they have mistaken the cause of the outburst. A murder has been committed in the garden, and the hunt is for the person who has done it. In these circumstances the lover is found dishevelled and bleeding, having tried in vain to make his way out over the garden walls, and he is instantly confronted with the choice of either allowing himself to be arrested as a murderer or of declaring his innocence and thereby ruining the reputation of the lady. Like the noble English gentleman he is, he does not hesitate, and is ready to save the lady at any price. In this he has the co-operation of the duke, who with his clear elderly eyes has been perfectly aware of what had taken place. Yet he, too, is a finely conceived character, and is not without an excuse for allowing an innocent man to suffer. He is under no illusion as to the character of his wife, as may be seen from the following passage:

"I knew it," said the duke. "She also, the duchess, is in love with you."

Michael drew back perceptibly. His manner changed.

"A little—not much," continued the duke. "I watched her, when you gave up yourself. She could have saved you. She could save you still—by a word. But she will not speak it. She appeared to love me a little once. I was not deceived. I knew. She loves you a little now. Why do you deceive yourself, my friend? There is only one person for whom she has a permanent and deep affection—for her very charming self."

The words fell into the silence of the bare room. Michael's thin hands, tightly clenched, shook a little.

The duke bent towards him.

"Is she worth it?" he said, with sudden passion.

No answer. Michael hid his face in his hands.

"Is she worth it?" said the duke again.

Michael looked up suddenly at the duke, and the elder man winced at the expression in his face. He looked through the duke, through his veiled despair and disillusion, beyond him.

"Yes, she is worth it," he said. "You do not understand her because you only love her in part. I meant to serve her by leaving Rome, but now I can't leave it. What I can do for her I will. It is no sacrifice—I am glad to do it, to have the chance. I have always wished—to serve her—to put my hands under her feet."

The truth is that the duke knows he has but a short time to live, one little year at most, and he too has a past. He had loved a woman and had induced her to leave husband and family for him, and she died of a broken heart. Miss Cholmondeley's chief study is of Fay, the woman who had selfishly and ignobly allowed the man to suffer for her sake. There is no capital punishment in Italy, and he was sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment. During the early days he is buoyed up with the belief that she will come to his rescue, but this the small selfish heart refuses to do. Even the dying words of her husband, who passes away as he foretold, do not induce her to take the step to which she should have been prompted by honour:

"It is spring," he said, looking full at her with tender fixity, and for a moment she thought his mind was wandering. "Spring once more. The sun shines. He does not see them, the spring and the sunshine. Since a year he does not see them. Francesca, how much longer will you keep your cousin Michael in prison?"

And thereupon the duke closed his eyes on this world, and went upon his way.

Thus Fay returns to her English home weighted with the knowledge that her true and devoted lover is undergoing the horrors of an Italian prison, just because she is too mean and too cowardly to set him free. Her very weakness is the cause of her torture. A person of a stronger mind and a more robust selfishness would have heartlessly dismissed the subject, but it weighs upon her until her days and her nights become an endless misery, and step by step she is driven by the remorseless action of her own mind to confess first to her sister and then to the Bishop. At this point Miss Cholmondeley has one of her weak moments and has to invoke the long arm of coincidence. At the very moment when Fay had confessed, the true murderer had been discovered.

The bishop came back, and sat down opposite them.

"Fay," he said, "as long as you live you will be thankful that you came to me to-day, that you were willing to make atonement by this great act of reparation. The comfort of that remembrance will sink deep into your troubled heart, and will heal its wounds. But the sacrifice is not to be exacted of you. I had to ask if you were willing to make it. But there is no longer any necessity for you to make it. Do you understand?"

The bishop spoke slowly. The two women looked at him with dilated eyes.

"Is Michael dead?" said Magdalen.

"No. Michael is, I believe, well. The murderer of the Marchese di Maltagliola has confessed. It is in to-day's papers. The Marchese was murdered by his wife. It was quite sudden and unpremeditated, the work of an instant of terror. She has made a full confession on her deathbed. It exonerates Michael entirely. She implores forgiveness for her long silence."

But by this time fresh complications have arisen. Like other weak characters, the girl has come to hate those who know what she has done, and even the lover in his prison has lost the place he once held in her heart. She has found a certain peace and comfort in the company of his brother Wentworth, a well-drawn character who plays a considerable part on the boards. It may be as well to say here that, fine as is Miss Cholmondeley's analysis of the feminine mind and feminine frailty, her men, admirable as they undoubtedly are in other respects, lack the final merit of masculinity. The good duke who dies with forgiveness on his lips is, after all, only a very fine and delicately minded woman. Michael in his martyrdom shows far more of the heroic woman's long-suffering and endurance than of the man's dominating energy: Wentworth, his brother, is furiously offended because one of his friends calls him an old maid, but that is really what he is. He wears a coat and trousers, but the novelist must have studied his model in petticoats. Even Colonel Bellairs, despite the expletives put into his mouth occasionally, is little more than a tempestuous virago. It would be unfair to pass any severe condemnation on Miss Cholmondeley on account of this, because it is a fact which nothing can get over, that no woman novelist has ever yet been able to paint a man. Even George Eliot's heroes and villains were either old maids, or, as in the case of Tito Melema, improper women in trousers. Except for this final characteristic, the men are, however, as well drawn as the women, and the author seems to unveil the inmost sanctuaries of their hearts. It is greatly to her credit that she deals in no very extraordinary characters. The people who pass over these pages are the ordinary men and women that one meets in the world. Not one is particularly gifted, not one approaches being anything like a genius, yet they have the passions, ambitions and foibles common to all humanity, and it is in their humanity that the merit of the writer lies. We have seldom read a book that is more suggestive, in the best sense of the word, and conveys to us more of the romance and pain of life which the old minstrels wove into their ballads, and which gives value to the great epics of the past.

The previous work of Miss Cholmondeley was full of promise, but this is more than promise: it is performance. In no modern novel has the female mind been analysed with a more delicate sense. The history of Fay is one to make us wonder that men should ever have sacrificed their lives for a reward so little to be desired as the love of a woman of this kind. Yet it has been so in the past, and we suppose will continue to be so until the end of the world.

THE ENGLISH HYMNAL

The English Hymnal. With Tunes. (Oxford: University Press, 3s., 3s. 6d., 5s. 6d., and 6s. all net.)

THE publication of this book is an event of more than ordinary interest, in that it marks a distinct advance on all previous attempts to supply the Church of England with a manual of sacred song. It is an open secret that the volume owed its origin to the widespread feeling of disappointment that followed the issue of the revised editions of "Hymns Ancient and Modern" and of "Church Hymns" a few years ago. A great opportunity was then missed. But the compilers of the new hymnal, with their literary taste and width of sympathy and instinct for liturgical fitness, bid fair to redeem the loss by having provided a book which for strength and variety is unmatched by any other collection. They are to be congratulated, not only on the richness and originality of their venture, but on the extraordinarily high level which they have maintained throughout. Though their collection contains some six hundred and fifty hymns, hardly anything has been admitted which fails to stand the test of literary force, or is unsuited to be the vehicle of devout and rational aspiration. The compilers have gone back as far as possible to original phraseology, giving the author's name and date. Among the two hundred translations which they have included, they are themselves responsible for some of the most felicitous examples. They have ranged far afield in modern as well as ancient pastures, and it is refreshing to encounter lines by Lowell and Whittier, Spenser, Blake, Scott, Tennyson, and Rudyard Kipling by the side of all the well-known hymn-writers of the last half-century.

A volume that is offered "for use in the Church of Eng'land as a companion to the Book of Common Prayer," has a definitely ecclesiastical purpose, the object of the promoters being to make provision for the liturgical needs of English Churchmen. Such an aim might easily have spelt disaster in less capable hands, and it is safe to say that it could not have been so successfully accomplished twenty or thirty years ago. Much progress has recently been made in ecclesiastical studies, and we have come to understand more fully the principles of liturgical development, the structure and meaning of corporate forms of worship, and the devotional significance of the rites of the Christian Church. And, as we learn to appreciate the workmanship of the Prayer Book, so we are being led to respect its genius, and to cherish its witness to the "Nationalism" of our religion, as opposed on the one side to a spurious Catholicism which speaks of all things English as "insular," and on the other to the irreverence that dates the birth of Christianity at the Reformation. By the conjoint labour of a body of ecclesiastical experts we are now feeling our way towards a ritual which shall be neither that of Rome nor of Geneva, nor a hybrid combination of the two, but shall definitely express the English tradition of worship in the English way. This movement has been criticised as a piece of ecclesiastical pedantry; but it is a movement on the right lines. And if some of the experts are not free from archæological fads, their work as a whole is receiving a generous welcome from all who value the national individuality of our religion no less than the continuity of its historic growth.

The new hymnal has sprung out of the heart of this modern tendency, and reflects its excellences as well as its defects. The compilers have interpreted "the use of the Church of England" in the light of modern investigation and with a genuine sympathy for the historical antecedents of the Book of Common Prayer and its liturgical framework. They have made indeed a brilliant and learned effort to enrich the public worship of the Church. A splendid array of Office Hymns, translated from the ancient service-books of the Church, and retaining the crisp and nervous power of the Latin, form a valuable and effective supplement to the rendering of our Morning and Evening Prayer. Again, the sections devoted to Processionals and Litanies are admirable, alike in their contents and their arrangement. A "Procession" is not a straggling walk by the men and boys of the choir from the Vestry into the Church, but a definite act of worship for the whole congregation, the choir starting always from the Chancel, with regular pauses for devotion. In the new hymnal, therefore, the processions for the greater feasts have the versicle and response printed in full, and the collect suggested: while in the Litanies these are introduced by the Kyrie, and the Pater-noster. Beside the usefulness of this printed scheme, a word of praise is due to the skilful manner in which the original metre of several of the hymns translated from English processionals has been preserved, the sonorous roll of hexameter and pentameter having been reproduced with marked success.

The last part of the book contains Introits and other anthems for use at Holy Communion. Here the hand of the liturgical expert is rather too apparent. Grails, tracts, commons, etc., are among the excrescences of worship which our reformers explicitly rejected; and such interpolations, though prepared with accurate research and a thorough respect for Scripture, are too intricate and elaborate for the present form of our English rite. It would have been well if the compilers had limited this section to Introits, with the Benedictus and the Agnus Dei, all of which were allowed to remain in the first edition of our Reformed Liturgy.

There are other places also in which the claim of the hymnal to be "not a party-book" may be called in question. Keble's "Ave Maria!" and, in particular, a hymn in honour of the Virgin by the Rev. V. S. S. Coles obviously presuppose a doctrine considered by many to be foreign to the Church of England. To insert a metrical paraphrase also of the "Anima Christi" is to court dogmatic objection. And microscopic analysis might detect in the Eucharistic hymns several affirmations which go beyond the language of the Catechism and the Liturgy. Yet these are of trifling import; and save for the verses and anthems suggested for the Holy Communion, the contents of the book may be said at once to lie within the broad and comprehensive limits that are characteristic of our National Church. To all but zealous partisans inclusion rather than exclusion is the note of a true Catholicity.

Ample space is assigned, as is natural, to the Fasts and Festivals of the Church. But a new note is struck in the provision of special hymns for the seasons, among which two sonnets by Samuel Longfellow on Summer and Winter deserve special recognition. Another direction in which the compilers have attained a real success is in their treatment of the theme of the departed. Not only have they avoided giving any occasion of dogmatic offence, but they have recovered for us the sense of joy and triumph which was universal in the early ages of Christianity, when the Gospel was felt indeed to have robbed death of its sting and terror. There is nothing "funereal" in the new hymn-book. A requiem, beautiful in its simplicity, comes from Central Africa, where it was written in Swahili for the members of the Universities Mission. Other selections have been taken from Isaac Watts and R. F. Littledale, and Canon Rawnsley contributes an excellent hymn; while Mr. Percy Dearmer, one of the promoters, is responsible for another, beginning:

God, we thank Thee; not in vain,
Lived our friend on Thee believing:
Not for him can we be grieving,
Ours the loss, but his the gain.
Ours the vanity of sorrow,
His the vision from the height,
His to-day—and ours to-morrow—
Change and awe and love and light.

A welcome feature of the book is the inclusion of a number of social hymns. As an alternative to the national anthem we can sing "God bless our native land," and also the magnificent hymn by Ebenezer Elliot, with its intensity of passion and chastened eloquence:

When wilt Thou save the people?
O God of Mercy, when?
The people, Lord, the people—
Not thrones and crowns, but men!
Flowers of Thy heart, O God, are they;
Let them not pass, like weeds, away,
Their heritage a sunless day—
God save the people!

Mr. G. K. Chesterton has penned a characteristic utterance; and with Kipling's "Recessional," and part of Russell Lowell's poem on "the Crisis," this section of the hymnal is one of its most original and praiseworthy efforts. Elsewhere too we meet with some notable expressions of social hope and feeling, among which we may quote the opening verse of a fine contribution by Canon H. Scott Holland:

Judge Eternal, throned in splendour,
Lord of lords and King of kings,
With Thy living fire of judgement
Purge this realm of bitter things;
Salace all its wide dominion
With the healing of Thy wings.

Of the hymns for children and mission services little need be said. The latter are almost all familiar, "Tell me the old, old story," "Safe in the arms of Jesus," and "Hold the fort!" reappearing among other favourites. The compilers have wisely given opportunity for stirring appeal and fervid emotion, although enthusiasm is never allowed to degenerate into a wild and irreverent rhapsody of feeling. Hymns for the young are confessedly difficult to find. Mrs. Alexander was, as a rule, successful; but it is doubtful how far the young care to sing "We are but little children poor," or can join in Charles Wesley's "Pity my simplicity," or the evening prayer, "Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me, Bless thy little lamb to-night." Adult sentimentalism is out of place on the lips of small folk, who throw it off with disdain at the time when their dolls and toys and other playthings fall away. More useful are those hymns which take the form of a metrical catechism, or a song about Nature, or a versified picture from the Bible. This division of the hymnal might have been shortened with advantage; for children ought to be made familiar from the start only with such hymns as they will be able to sing at any age.

The "English Hymnal," however, must be judged as a whole. It would be unreasonable to expect that no flaws are to be discovered within its pages. Yet the more this book is studied, the more do its general excellences appear. Its liturgical accuracy could not be surpassed; its literary work is always strong, and its scope is broad and sympathetic alike to "things old and new." The ecclesiastical world is apt to be conservative, and the process of public judgment on the new hymnal is sure to be slow. Yet it is to be hoped that the book will be studied with the care which it deserves: for as a collection of Sacred Poetry for the use of English Churchmen it stands easily without a rival in the field.

I. THE POWERS OF MEMORY

THE Scottish philosopher Sir William Hamilton used to throw emphasis on a distinction of much importance between the conservative and the reproductive faculty; or the power of accumulating and retaining past experience in the storehouses of memory, and the power of recalling it again, bringing it back to consciousness from latency, to live a second time when thus reproduced. One of these may be at a maximum, while the other is at a minimum; and, what is much more important, the former may work as accurately as a printing-machine in its automatic action, while the other is inaccurate, broken, fitful, and even chaotic. It is a fascinating psychological problem, but it may also be dealt with as a historical one, in reference to the capacity of giving accurate reports of occurrences, or of speeches, conversations, addresses, etc., which have come down to us from a distant age.

It cannot be wondered at that many entertain doubts as to the authenticity of these recorded speeches, conversations and addresses, when we remember that there were no printing-presses in the ancient world, or reporters who took down each word of the sentences when spoken; and yet we have volumes recording the dialogues of sages such as Socrates and his companions, the addresses of orators, the speeches of barristers, the manifestoes of kings, the discourses of prophets, and the parables and other sayings of Christ.

It is to the latter that reference will be made in this short paper, because a real difficulty is felt by many as to the reproductions in the four Gospels, in literal detail, of the discourses and casual sayings of Christ. Many thousands have asked themselves, and have questioned others in vain,—how can we be sure that these are the very sayings that were spoken two thousand years ago—the ipsissima verba of the speaker—since there were no short-hand reporters in those days, and stenography was unknown? The question is a very natural one. It must be remembered, however, that the powers of memory were then probably much greater than they are now with us. The ability to reproduce, with almost literal accuracy, addresses, conversations, speeches, by the aid of memory alone may be a power which the world has, to a great extent, lost. It is possible that the very multiplication of aids to memory, the artificial means of recording words and phrases, has diminished for the modern world the ability to hand them on by the old and very natural method of oral reproduction and transmission. It was probably the same in the case of the conversations of Socrates, as recorded by Plato and Xenophon. The attendant pupil-friends were not literal reporters. They were probably much better, perpetuating their Master's words—or at least his ideas—by a divining tact which conserved their essence for all time.

In illustration, the present writer records a fact which he lately learned in Galilee, which was new to him then and there, and which seems to prove that the power of accurately reporting, and perpetuating by oral means, still exists in the Eastern World, however much it may have vanished from the Western, and to a certain extent from Christendom. A trustworthy witness-bearer assured him that he had read an address of some length to a miscellaneous audience and that some months afterwards it was all given back to him, verbatim et literalim, by one of the listeners who heard it. It had impressed itself so indelibly on the "sensitive plate" of that auditor's consciousness that he was able to reproduce it word for word with ease; the interval of time being apparently a matter of no consequence. It is well known that if the interval be one of a few minutes only, authentic and exact reproduction is possible. But it may surely be that, to the sympathetic listener, this latent power may remain unaffected by successive intervening incidents; and that we have thus the data of authentic history guaranteed to us, and the means of its reproduction supplied. I had no opportunity of verifying this by living instances, while in the East; but there can be no doubt as to the fact itself; although its extent may be unknown and its range disputable. Doubtless the power of authentic reproduction will vary with the general capacity and temperament of the individuals who possess it; and it is worth noting that it would be much easier to record and chronicle short sayings, proverbs, apothegms, parables, etc., than lengthy orations and discourses. A dialogue is more easily remembered and reported than a lecture is, a drama than an epic narrative; as the characters supply so many pegs on which the incidents hang, the remarks of the dramatis personæ—the questions put, and the answers given—may render even the details of the conversation permanent, and make them easier to reproduce.

SPECTATOR AB EXTRA.

THE USELESSNESS OF KNOWLEDGE

THERE is a delightful scene in "Mansfield Park," where Maria and Julia Bertram discover the depths of Fanny Price's ignorance, and report the result of their investigation to Mrs. Norris.

"But, aunt, she really is so very ignorant," says Maria. "I cannot remember the time when I did not know a great deal that she has not the least notion of yet. How long ago is it, aunt, since we used to repeat the chronological order of the kings of England with the dates of their accession, and most of the principal events of their reigns?"

"Yes," added Julia, "and of the Roman emperors as low as Severus; besides a great deal of the heathen mythology, and all the metals, semi-metals, planets, and distinguished philosophers."

"Very true indeed, my dears," says Mrs. Norris, "but you are blessed with wonderful memories, and your poor cousin has probably none at all. There is a vast deal of difference in memories, as well as in everything else, and therefore you must make allowance for your cousin, and pity her deficiency. And remember that if you are ever so forward and clever yourselves, you should always be modest; for much as you know already, there is a great deal more for you to learn."

"Yes, I know there is," says Julia, "till I am seventeen."

With such delicate strokes of satire does Miss Austen dispose of the fallacy of the value of correct information, and of its emollient effect upon the character. The fact, of course, is that knowledge, in itself, is one of the most useless things in the world, when it is possessed by persons who wear it simply as an isolated ornament. The only use it can have in the case of ordinary people is to enlarge the mental horizon and quicken sympathy. Of course, it is a valuable instrument enough in the hands of a specialist; but that is the worst of our educational schemes, that they are all made by specialists and theorists, as if the design were to turn out specialists by the score.

To the ordinary person, for instance, the study of history is valuable, not that he may learn the movement of political forces and the development of constitutional theories; but that he may realise that there was a time when people looked, thought, and talked differently; and further that he may learn, however dimly, the benefits of liberty and civilisation. It is a fruitless quest, with the majority of minds, to hope to train them to have a grip of conflicting tendencies, or to enable them to form a sound and catholic judgment on historical problems. In the first place, their knowledge can never be wide and sound enough for that, nor sufficiently at their command. What ought really to be aimed at is to kindle the imagination, to awaken generous admiration, to set people aglow with the idea that it is worth while to make personal sacrifices in order to achieve some public-spirited end, in order to make others wiser, stronger, and happier. The best part of history for ordinary minds is that which deals with the lives and characters and efforts of noble-minded and ardent personalities, which quickens the sense of the largeness and the romance of the world. Yet these are two things that are hurried over by the conscientious teacher as being sentimental and dilettante, in favour of a knowledge of the events of a campaign, or the provisions of an Act.

Science is similarly misused. The value of science is to teach the ordinary man to look with an intelligent eye at the natural phenomena which surround him, dews and winds, fire and frost, birds and beasts, flowers and trees, pebbles and hills. Which is better, the child who can enter into the agreeable romantic effect of the line, "I, said the fly, 'with my little eye,'" or the child that knows that the description is inadequate, and that the fly's eye is an agglutination of dioptric lenses? It is all right that he should know the latter, if he realises the marvellous fact that, all the world over, there are millions and millions of these tiny creatures, restless, busy, tiresome things, provided by some inscrutable provision of a central law with these amazing instruments of vision. That might perhaps touch the sense of poetical mystery, the incredible vastness and antiquity of the scheme of things in which we have a part. Of course, for practical purposes, there must be some attempt to develop accuracy in immature minds, but the aim of education seems too often to be to try to give people a false conceit of knowledge, instead of trying to initiate them into the sense of how grotesquely little is in reality known on any subject at all.

The fact that seems to be lost sight of in our schemes of education is that most of the people who are educated are destined to do the necessary drudgery of the world; and an educator's object ought therefore to be to develop mental curiosity, to touch the imagination, to create interest in simple intellectual pleasures. To enable people to do their work contentedly, and to fill their unoccupied hours rationally, ought to be the end of ordinary education. But as long as it is thought that education is the amassing of correct and accurate information so long will all our educational schemes be a failure.

Perhaps it is as well to get the machinery first; but the next thing to do is to make it worth the while of generous, intelligent, sympathetic and enthusiastic people to devote themselves to the profession of teaching, and to leave them as unfettered as possible as to the method with which they will deal with their subjects. Examination ought not to test how much knowledge has been acquired, but how far observation and general intelligence have been developed. The pathetic thing is that we have developed a sense of the importance of education; we have somehow or other got into our heads that every one has an inalienable right to be educated; but we are still in the dark as to the objects of education; instead of thinking that it is a process which ought to end in making men and women more simple, more content, more happy, we have a vague idea that it will enable us to retain our commercial superiority and to keep ahead of America and Germany. The success, in my belief, of German education is attested not by their commercial prosperity, but by the fact that Germans are genuinely devoted to intellectual and artistic pleasures. In England we fall between two stools; we despise the things of the mind, and though we worship commercial success we do not know how to attain it. Yet we dare not make experiments; we cling dully and mournfully to outworn systems.

Of course, the worst of making experiments on individuals, and educating a child on unconventional lines, is that the child may eventually turn out to be a conventional person, who may in later life only feel that he has been made the victim of an eccentric theory. For the most potent and deadly force, that we have to deal with in England, is the force of conventionality, the fact that to most of us the one impossible thing is to have an opinion of our own. It is not exactly timidity that causes this; it is rather a strong instinct to prefer at all costs being normal. The most refreshing person that it is possible to meet in England is the man or woman who has a theory of life, who knows what he or she desires, and regulates life accordingly. Unfortunately this is too often combined with a deep-seated selfishness, but when it is found in combination with sympathy, and amiability, and a sense of the rights of others it is an entirely admirable and delightful character.

The melancholy thing is that, however clearly one may see this, it is impossible to persuade people, by judicious argument, to be simple, sincere and unconventional. The most that any one can do who admires and desires such qualities, is to pursue them with all his might, without minding being misunderstood or misinterpreted. Not to do this stridently or officiously or offensively; but humbly, quietly and modestly; not quenching the smoking flax, but fanning it into flame; not breaking the bruised reed, but drawing out such faint music as may be saved from its shattered stops.

THE MODERN CYCLOPEDIA

Edited by CHAS. ANNANDALE, MA., LL.D., for it is the best work of reference you can purchase.

There are many reasons for this. Here are 5 of the most important.

1. It is the only Cyclopaedia right UP-TO-DATE. The first volume of the new edition is only just ready.
2. It is the cheapest RELIABLE cyclopaedia. Many Encyclopedias cost almost as many POUNDS as "The Modern Cyclopaedia" costs SHILLINGS.
3. It is authoritative. Dr. Annandale, the Editor-in-Chief, enjoys a worldwide reputation and is generally recognised as one of the greatest of living encyclopaedists.
4. It is the most concise, compact, cyclopaedia obtainable. Frequent, indeed, are the complaints we hear of the "morass of detail" other cyclopedias contain, cumbersome nature of the volumes, amount of shelf space required.
5. It is the only up-to-date cyclopaedia you can get for a cash payment of a few shillings a month and not on the instalment plan.

8 beautifully illustrated volumes—both black and white and colour —make up the work. Each volume measures 8½ by 6 and costs

SPELLING REFORM AS IT AFFECTS ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS

By DR. MACNAMARA, M.P.

It is significant of much that though the most conservative class in the community and acutely conscious of the thousand difficulties in the way, teachers as a body are cordially with the Spelling Reformers. And why? They, above all other persons interested, know the misery and travail involved in the attempt to teach the bewildering collocation of contradictions and conundrums mis-called our system of spelling. There is that classic pitfall "i before e except after c"; and there is skein, seize, heir, deign, and feign. Imagine the mental condition of the pupil who has got thus far. Rational instincts and an accurate attitude of mind are killed at the outset. Then—not to multiply instances—there is the sound value of the letter-combination gh. The unhappy pupil is taught that r-o-u-g-h is ruff; he applies the spelling to stuff or muff or cuff and—there is trouble. He is taught l-a-u-g-h is laff; he tries on the same letter-combination for staff, calf, chaff and half and is full of perplexity, if not indeed of pain, as a sequel.

I need not pursue the matter. But I will add to my comment on the waste of precious time and the hopeless irritation of spirit caused by English spelling the fact that to all this we add the monstrosities of our System of Weights and Measures. Deliberately I say that these alone are responsible for the waste of more than a good year of the average child's school life. Look at the matter for a moment. The child is taught that sixteen drams make an ounce and sixteen ounces a pound. Then they go on to insist that twenty pennyweights make an ounce and twelve ounces make a pound. And then finally, to break his simple faith in everything, they assure him that eight drams make an ounce and twelve ounces a pound. It is all very well to add the proviso that one of the aforesaid pounds is a pound "avoirdupois," another a pound "troy," and the third a pound "apothecaries". I wish we could really get to know what the hapless scholar really thinks of it all. It is because of all this and a good deal more that the teachers—knowing as they do full well the new labours for them which change involves—are not only Spelling Reformers but ardent advocates of a Decimal System of Weights and Measures and Coinage.

Very well. The question is, what is to be done? Of course you can simplify spelling, as we have been slowly and tediously doing for generations and as the Americans have been doing much more rapidly during the last twenty or thirty years. You can give up spelling music m-u-s-i-c-k, public p-u-b-l-i-c-k, governor g-o-u-r-n-e-r, lion l-y-o-n, his h-y-s, and clothes c-l-o-a-t-h-es. You can write catalog, program, pedagog, tho, thru, thoroly, altho, labor, honor, candor, demagog, domicil, esthetic, goodby, licorice, odor, omelet, phenix—as the Americans have been doing long before Mr. Carnegie's thousands, Professor Brander Matthews's and President Roosevelt's 300 words. But you cannot get much further. And why? Because your alphabet is hopelessly faulty. You have six-and-twenty symbols. Three—c, q, and x—may be struck out as being redundant. Therefore you are left with twenty-three symbols to represent roughly about twice as many everyday human articulations. What is the consequence? Some of these twenty-three effective symbols have to do duty for more than one sound-value. Take the vowel a. This one little letter does duty for any number of different sound-values. It has one sound-value in fat, another in father, a third in fate, a fourth in fall, a fifth in senate, and so on.

So with the other vowels. So again with letters here pronounced hard, there pronounced soft.

Then again in many words letters are stuck in for no obvious purpose whatever. Take the silent letters in heir, lamb, doubt, and so on.

Again, there is the curious and bewildering circumstance that many words are pronounced alike but spelt differently. I may instance ale and ail; air, ere, e'er, heir, and Ayr; aisle, isle, and i'll; all and awl; assent and ascent; ought and ought; aunt and ant.

Finally—not to do more than touch the fringe of a most amazing study—there is the even more mentally paralysing fact that a number of words are spelt alike but pronounced differently. For instance:

minute is pronounced	minil and mi-nul .
proceeds	" prö-sēdz and prö-sēdz .
rebel	" rēb-ēl and rē-bēl .
wind	" wind and wind .
contract	" kön-trakt and kön-trakt .
desert	" dē-zert and dēz-ert .
live	" liv and liv .
project	" pröj-ekt and prö-jēkt .
house	" hous and houz .
close	" klöz and klös .
produce	" prö-duce and pröd-uce .

Now it is patent that no amount of mere simplification along the Roosevelt lines can come anywhere near the root of the matter. That can only be tackled by the setting up of an entirely new alphabet, the foundation of which shall be one symbol and one symbol only for every articulate sound—in a word, a brand new and purely phonetic alphabet. That has been in vogue for years with the more advanced of the reformers; but it is clear that the day of its general adoption is a very long way off indeed. All we can do just now is to follow slowly and patiently the line of simplification marked out by the Brander Matthews Board, taking care, of course, not to obliterate the authentic pedigree of any word in our painfully slow step towards simplicity. And, as has been most properly pointed out several times already since the issue of the now famous Roosevelt edict, it is imperative that any Simplification Board that is going to carry weight with the Anglo-Saxon speaking people all the world over must be representative of those people north, south, east and west. It will never do for a purely American Board to try to set the pace. If this is attempted, the very conservative Anglo-Saxon people of the Western Hemisphere will get "huffy"—to put the matter colloquially—and the result will simply be a Yankee-ised form of English spelling for use in America only. This will be a pity. You cannot apply the Monroe Doctrine in this case. Therefore all I can suggest is the creation of a Simplified Spelling Board constituted of philologists representative of all parts of the Anglo-Saxon spelling community. Such a Board might advance the cause of simplification enormously; and some day, several centuries ahead, might even tackle the matter at its root. Who knows?

By J. H. YOXALL, M.P.

I CONFESS myself an anarchist in the matter of spelling. I would have no conventional rules or penal laws about it at all. I would let everybody spell as they pleased, sure that the most would spell well. But if there is to be a recognised standard I would keep the English Dictionary unchanged, except by gradual and natural modification. A language is a tree.

I think it a mistake to suppose that what is now being called Spelling Reform matters greatly to the elementary schools. To many of the children—perhaps in more or less degree to most—reading and writing do come by nature, as Dogberry said: and in learning to read and write they learn to spell. To most of the other children the toil and exercise of amending their spelling habit is a useful discipline; we must not remove every pebble from the path, nor leave the learner nothing limy in his diet to build up his mental teeth on. Remain the incorrigible dunces at spelling, who never learn—not even in the prolonged school-days of adult life—to spell according to the dictionary; the case for change, as it affects the elementary schools, depends on whether or not a simplified and regularised dictionary-spelling would make the matter easier for these. I am afraid I cannot think that it would.

My own proposal is that the “dunces” should be permitted in after life to spell as they please and be unorthodox in that without shame. Orthodox spelling at present is considered a proof of education, just as sounding the aspirate is made a social test. I would rather the minority should be free to spell as best they can than the dictionary be transmogrified to convenience them. I would keep the old standard for the many and relax it for the few. If what I think to be the comparative few be really the comparative many—a question for experience and opinion—spelling reform on natural lines would come about of itself.

So far as legibility is concerned, ways of spelling matter very little. In certain examinations papers are set in which long screeds of most erratic spelling are introduced expressly, to be corrected by the pupils. Cast the eye over one of these papers and you will find that you can read the stuff just as easily as if it were conventional good English. If everybody spelled as they pleased we should still be able to understand each other's books, articles and letters. By a perverse fatality, if there be a boy in an elementary school who is constitutionally unable to spell, he usually becomes apprentice to a sign-writer or a printer. When he paints a sign-board he will letter on it the word “business.” That is no less and no more legible than “business.” Neither would “biznis” be.

Under go-as-you-please rules most people would continue to spell according to the orthodox traditions; certainly those of us would who have an eye that winces at Josh-Billingsgate. One result of the American copyright laws is to bring into this country stereoplates for books spelt in American. Such of the new spellings thus introduced as justify themselves to general opinion will come to be adopted here, and, I think, no other. Let the English dictionary modify as the language does, by survival of the fittest. But in the meantime the preachers of spelling reform must not overdo the argument from the schools.

Does a child learn to spell as a separate act from learning to read? I think he usually learns reading and spelling together, and mainly by the remembered look of the words with which his eye becomes familiar. In this matter memory is optical. A child does not reason about spelling. Logical forms are no easier for him to remember and reproduce than are the exceptions which reformers condemn; indeed, they are perhaps less so. I am not at all sure that either logical spelling or phonetical spelling would give ease to the work in schools. A sophistry lies in the argument for phonetical spelling, unless my proposal for legalised anarchy in the matter is allowed. For there would have to be, I suppose, a standard and recognised phonetic form for each word? Based on whose pronunciation? On whose accent and inflection? The accent of Oxford or of Stratford-atte-Bow?

The standard and recognised phoneticisms would have to be taught by the teachers and studied by the scholars, just as the present standards are in the elementary schools.

We should have exchanged a famous, historical and literature-sanctioned dictionary for a brand-new one, little easier—that would be all. For, if wholly left to the ear, spelling would vary much more and be less often correct than now. A “dunce” in this matter in an East London school, told to write “coffee” and “lady” according to the sound of the words, would be likely to write “korfeý” and “lydy.” It would take as long to get him to write “koffe” and “layde” (if those be the proper phonetical forms) as it does to get him to write “coffee” and “lady” now. “Cow, plough, rough, through,” are absurd enough, no doubt; but what would be the phonetical spelling of “bound down town” in South Yorkshire? “Baan’ daan taan” is what Hallamshire children would write. And again—the correct phonetical spelling of “vase”? Vays, vahs, and vaws would be variously written for it, by educated people: for you hear educated people pronounce the word with those three variations in the vowel.

Enthusiasts for spelling reform assert that a year of a child's school-life could be economised for other studies by it. I very much doubt the computation. I think it a mere guess, and a bad one. I know very well that practice in spelling—the dictation lesson, the “word-building” lesson—takes up a good deal of time in school. But the arithmetical lessons take up much more. A careful calculation has shown that if we could decimalise our money, weights and measures, we might use a year of a child's life for him in teaching him other subjects, during hours now spent on the intricacies of arithmetic which arise from anachronistic notation. In this respect spelling is the gnat and arithmetical notation the camel. The elementary schools and school-time generally would be vastly benefited by an arithmetical change: a spelling change is much less important to scholars and teachers. I remember Sir William Harcourt, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, telling a deputation that no nation had ever adopted a Decimal system except during or soon after a Revolution. I should like to see an arithmetical revolution precede the one which spelling reformers advocate.

But all this is not to say that we might not do something of what the French Academy has done for French grammar and spelling—proceed to prune the most redundant and abandon the most practically archaic. It would be good for the schools to remove the distinction between “blessed” and “blest,” and their congeners, for example. Where there are two dictionary forms for the same word, as with “edile” and “ædile,” the simpler might be kept and the other discarded. “Fantasy” instead of “phantasy” is justified by “fantastic.” And so on.

But adz, armor, ax, blusht, clasp, cutlas, decalog, dike, and so on, are no easier for a child's eye to recognise and remember than are adze, armour, axe, blushed, clasp, cutlass, decalogue, dyke, and so on. And where the argument from utility is a weak one, the argument from literature and language-history must remain strong. Many pieces of classical English literature have been printed in phonography for years, but the fertilising flood of cheap reprints in recognised English still flows on; longhand lasts, though shorthand is the better. Convinced that the utilitarian gain to the elementary schools would be small, I dread the literary, lingual, and disciplinary loss to them which anything wholesale in the way of spelling reform would cause. Because we might very well write “blessed” blest, there is no reason to go on to write “blushed” blusht. To gain a letter the less may mean to lose an idea, a picture, an association, a rich past.

Perhaps the chief fault of the elementary school lies in coldness towards literature; though it is the ex-elementary scholars who purchase the millions of shilling and sixpenny reprints of famous books which are sold every year. I should be jealous of any change in word-form which would uglify literature to the cultivated eye. More cultivation, not more simplification, is perhaps the true aim. And as I am not convinced that simplification is so necessary for the elementary schools, or would be so helpful, as the advocates of great change suppose, I cannot but feel lukewarm (to say the least of it) towards their pleas for spelling reform.

Let "dunces" spell as they please, let advertisements be written in the shortest and boldest orthography, let the language of the United States modify as it will; but here let us keep, so long as we can, for the Council school as well as for Harrow and Christ Church, a "well of English undefiled."

CO-EDUCATION (IN PRACTICE)

By JOHN RUSSELL

I HAVE been a believer in co-education ever since I have been a true believer in education, and no argument or fact that I have ever heard has shaken my view that general and efficient co-education will some day be found to be the most powerful preventive of the grave social evils that have their roots in the misunderstanding and misuse of men by women, and especially of women by men.

But it is only during the last five years that I have had personal experience of a mixed school, and even that experience has been practically confined to the ages of seven to fourteen.

In spite, however, of my limited experience, I feel that I can best serve the Editor's purpose by contributing not theories but facts—the facts revealed by that experience, or rather the facts as my colleagues and I have seen them.

Our school is a day-school for children of what it is customary to call the "upper middle class." It is small, seldom numbering more than fifty. Boys and girls are about equally divided, but—for reasons I need not stop to state, though I may stop to deplore them—there has always been a preponderance of girls in the top-class (average age fourteen to sixteen) and in consequence an undue and unfortunate preponderance of girl-prefects. We are a mixed staff of men and women, and our co-education is about as complete as we can make it, everything except lavatories being in common. In other words, in the organisation of all school-activities sex is entirely disregarded, though in the general treatment of individuals, it is of course allowed its full personal value.

Under these not unfavourable conditions, I have observed many things, to the most significant of which I shall now refer.

My first general observation is this: that the fusion in the minds of the staff of the boy and girl into the child has been so complete, that except of deliberate purpose we never differentiate between the sexes but only between individuals. I do not mean that sex is not felt to be at the bottom of individuality; I only mean that in our every-day feeling, thinking and acting this fact does not persistently obtrude itself.

And even when I do of set purpose differentiate, I can only arrive at the following lame generalisations: That (as every schoolboy knows) the general behaviour of girls is better than that of boys—by which I mean that girls have more personal self-respect, more innate sense of orderliness, more regard for constituted authority, more consideration for the feelings of others, more power of steady application, and, though by no means tongue-tied, more tongue-control.

I have found that boys, on the other hand, have much more initiative, much more inventiveness. We have new play-ground activities every term, new societies (secret and other) every term, new illustrated magazines nearly every term. Most of these things have a glorious hour and cease to be, but they are nearly all the work of boys. The conspicuous exception was a "Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Teachers" founded by a girl with a future.

And boys certainly have more natural aptitude for games, and age for age, would always beat girls at cricket, and, I think, at hockey.

Except in these respects, I do not find it easy to distinguish between them. In the class-room, age for age, they work with apparently equal zest (or its opposite), and with apparently equal success (or its opposite). And so in all the other school-activities, including workshop, gymnastics and gardening. Many and great differences of course there are, but they seem to result from the ordinary differences of personal equipment, rather than from the special differences of sex.

In my short experience of co-education then, I have seen quite clearly at least this: that boys and girls can work and play together in a spirit of perfect good comradeship, with no more cliquism than in a boys' or a girls' school, and that they can do this to their great mutual benefit. The benefits we have especially observed are that sentimentality and timorousness and other lackadaisical girlish qualities tend to wither away in the robust physical atmosphere created by the boys, and that rough rude boyish manners, including the use of ugly language, are considerably softened by the refining influence of girls. I do not of course hear one-hundredth part of what my boys say, but I keep untiring watch and have never heard or suspected a foul word. Can any master of any boys' school say the same?

Of conscious—or even unconscious—emulation between boys and girls we have seen very little. And of growth in mutual understanding and respect—supreme objective of co-education—we can hardly in the nature of things see many visible signs while they remain boys and girls. But it is something that we have seen scarcely a trace of the old-fashioned boyish contempt for a girl, and still less of the old-fashioned girlish airs with a boy.

That, in a very rough and ready calculation, is the credit of the account. Is there anything on the other side? There is, and if this paper is to be an honest paper, that other side must be put.

The first item is not serious, but it is well that it should be stated. A few boys have resented the girls, a few girls the boys. The chief reasons for this, I think, have been on the one hand the tradition of girl-inferiority, and on the other the tradition of boy-roughness, both most unfortunately fostered at home by elder brothers and sisters. As co-education becomes more and more general, those traditions will become more and more impotent.

The second item is more serious and touches at last what many opponents of co-education regard as the root of the matter. I can imagine such an opponent asking me this question: Have you ever in your school seen any cases of conscious, or unconscious, sex-attraction? If so, did they lead to mischief? And if so, does not co-education stand self-condemned?

I will answer those questions, first by saying that I have seen such cases, then by briefly characterising them, and then by saying why I do not think that co-education thereby stands self-condemned.

Of unconscious sex-attraction I have seen in all four cases: two in boys of seven and eight whose behaviour (even though in one case the attraction was signed with a kiss) was as natural and beautiful as that of the child-lovers in Whittier's familiar poem; and two in boys of eleven, both of perfectly good character, in whom there was evident at one time a distinct special pleasure in the companionship and contact of elder girls.

Of cases of conscious attraction I have known only two:

The first was a case among the elder children of a special boy and girl friendship, so restrained as to have been almost unnoticed, yet so true as to have influenced them both profoundly—and, I must add, so right as to make me ashamed to seem to be suggesting that it was wrong.

The second was very different, and is the one case that has given me anxiety.

Two little boys of eight, both of whom I afterwards found had similarly offended before coming to us, tried upon one occasion to induce two other little boys and one little girl to join them in a game—as they called it—which, though not of a really grave nature, depended for its point upon sex-attributes. That the attempt met with no success does not lessen its significance.

That is the sum of the cases that have come to my notice in five years. We are as vigilant as we know how to be, but I cannot prove—or even assert—that nothing else of the sort has ever taken place. And even if I now found out that it had, I could not admit that co-education stood condemned—only that I did, as its guardian.

For I should hold that every boys' school and not a few girls' schools—if the truth were known—would show a far more serious record, and I should hold further that the poison—if poison it may be called—would work more immediate and more ultimate mischief among children of one sex, partly because the need for vigilance in this matter would not generally be so strongly felt, and partly because, whatever influence boys may exercise upon girls, there can be no doubt whatever that girls exercise an immense restraining influence upon boys, no less than women upon men.

I would further emphasise the fact that my only case of real trouble occurred among children under ten—the age up to which there is almost a unanimity of opinion in favour of co-education.

To my mind the real sex-danger in all schools—and I do not deny that it exists—is greatest before twelve. If pernicious habits—even of thought—are formed then, the whole life will bear the mark. Afterwards when the passions are stronger, the antidotes are stronger too. Among those antidotes three things, in my opinion, share the chief place: the frank, fearless teaching by parents of the mystery of fatherhood and motherhood; the provision of school-occupations calculated to promote a happy, healthy activity of body and mind; and the establishment, under the most carefully chosen mixed staff, of schools in all grades of genuine co-education.

IS ATHLETICISM OVERDONE AT PUBLIC SCHOOLS?

By NORMAN GALE

THE question that is printed at the head of this article is one that has divided parents into two camps, though assuredly it should not have brought about so marked an effect, especially at a time when it is a commonplace for most of us to talk with an air of wisdom about the many advantages to be gained by feeding ourselves at every possible chance upon fresh air. Many parents seem to think that a Public School is nothing if it is not a machine for polishing the brains of the young; and that when it is unengaged in this work it is idle, not because managers feel it their duty to see that fair play is done to the muscle as well as to the mind, but because the machinery would suffer were it to be run for more hours at a time than at present it is allowed to run. Surely it would be better to look upon a Public School as an institution nicely arranged for the two purposes of educating the sense and the sinew. For my part, were I a parent, I should be properly anxious, of course, about my boy's progress in subjects likely to help him at the earning stage of his life. I should, holiday after holiday, bundle him into my scales to see whether he was putting on mental flesh, so to speak; and, within fair limits, I should judge his teachers by the verdict of the scales. But even if the result should prove favourable to his masters, there would still be matters of importance to be tested between them and me. Suppose I found my boy to be admirably equipped in respect of ut with the conjunctive; to have a large Latin or Greek vocabulary stored in his head; to possess an almost Ciceronian knack of Latin prose. Well, all this would be much, but it would not be all for which I should look with keen anxiety; for I should soon be at his chest with a tape measure. Moreover, I should want to see the lad with shoulders in fine trim; with his head carried as if it were a thing of price, not a sloven's overburden; and with a manner of walking that should not be an insult to the road. If I found him to disappoint me in all these particulars, I should feel it my right to consider the authorities at his school somewhat to blame, because, in my opinion, no Public School is in keeping with the true spirit of education unless it works by the golden rule that the average boy is to be shaped not only in the class-room, but also in the playing-fields. When he is growing fast, it is best to look upon a boy as half-mind, half-muscle, and to teach these halves with judicious care. There is, unfortunately, a tendency among parents, and even, though in a smaller measure, among schoolmasters, to forget that the life of the class-room is nourished by the stores of sunshine and fresh air that have soaked into the boys while playing at their various games. A paragraph of Livy is sweetened for the scholar by the recollection that yesterday he got fifty runs in a House match; Virgil's web is unwound by him the more easily for no weightier reason than the remembrance that not many hours before the lesson he had brought down a flying three-quarter back when he was within a couple of yards of scoring a try. Few masters stop to think how greatly their work is lightened for them by the play that has preceded the hours to be spent at the desk and the blackboard. The spirits of play and work are closer companions than it is usual for many of us to remember.

After what has been said it will not come as a surprise to my readers to learn that, in my opinion, athleticism, in the general sense, is far from being overdone at Public Schools. I will go still further, and say that athleticism (this time the word is to carry the meaning of sport finely managed) does not receive the right amount of right attention. In the summer term a boy at Rugby School, if he is a performer of average merit, plays cricket for about twelve hours a week. Can it be seriously pretended that a growing lad ought to have fewer hours than these as relaxations from work, as benefits for muscles and lungs, and as chances for aiming at the honour of getting into the School Eleven? Cricket is a teacher on the honorary staff; but if it could receive a salary, how large that salary ought to be in return for its delightful mingling of health and eagerness, friendship and discipline, logic and adventure! Whether the official game of a term be cricket or football or running, I do not think it can be said by the thoughtful and fair-minded that a boy is pampered by the amount of vigorous exercise he is allowed to have at a Public School. I grant, of course, that such a system must be galling to such lads as are not to be measured by the measure used in the case of the normal English boy. But the general must be considered before the particular. Even sunshine vexes some of the creatures of the world, so we need not wonder that to a handful in every large assembly of boys the cricket ball stands for a symbol of purgatory. If parents want their sons to be all head and no chest, let them not cease to grumble till they have persuaded Head Masters to filch what has always been the cub's birthright—a season for frolic—from the youngsters in their charge. What I noticed in the days when I was a schoolmaster has led me to be more in favour of extending the playtime than of shortening it, because I am certain that play is to work what the bead is to the wine. The playing fields march, so to speak, into the classroom with the boys. I shall always believe that cricket and football are partial solvents of dead languages. Of two boys with equal powers of brain and equal times for study, the one a joyful athlete, the other nothing more notable than a collector of stamps or postcards, the lad in the sunshine, with his chances to learn a discipline while adding to his chest measurement, will keep in front of the picture-postcard boy in the race of life.

In an article so short as this it is not possible for me to say all I should like to say in defence of those who have allotted a generous amount of time for the pursuit of games at our Public Schools. I wish to be emphatic

Messrs. BELL'S

New Educational Books.

Messrs. Bell's Complete Educational Catalogues, or Prospectuses of any of the Books mentioned below, sent to any address on application.

Junior Practical Mathematics. By W. J. STAINER, B.A. Complete, 3s. or with Answers, 3s. 6d., or in Two Parts: Part I. (consisting chiefly of Arithmetic and Algebra), 2s. or with Answers, 2s. 6d. Part II. (Geometry and Mensuration), 1s. 6d.

This book has been designed to meet the needs of Preparatory Schools, Public Elementary and Higher Elementary Schools, and the lower forms of Secondary Schools. It represents an attempt to correlate the studies of the pupils in the various branches of Elementary Mathematics with any work in practical weighing and measuring which they may be afforded an opportunity of doing, and with the constructional exercises generally known as Hand and Eye Training.

The book is generally in accord with the "Suggestions for the Consideration of Teachers, etc.," recently issued by the Board of Education.

Pendlebury's Junior Arithmetic. 1s. 6d.; or with Answers, 2s. (The Answers separately, 6d. net.)

A new Arithmetic for the Lower and Middle Forms. Written on modern lines with free employment of Graphs, etc. It is especially suited to the requirements of the various Elementary Examinations.

Pendlebury's New Shilling Arithmetic. 1s.; or with Answers, 1s. 4d.

* Similar to the Junior Arithmetic, except that all treatment of the first four rules is omitted.

Experimental Geometry. An Introduction to Practical Geometry. By W. M. BAKER, M.A., and A. A. BOURNE, M.A. 1s. 6d. [Ready Shortly.]

Algebraic Geometry. A new Elementary Treatise on Analytical Conic Sections. By W. M. BAKER, M.A., 6s.; or Part I. (containing the Straight Line and the Circle), 2s. 6d.

This book is written for beginners, and for the average boy. The Straight Line and the Circle are very fully treated. The elementary ideas of the Calculus have been utilised, and full use made of one of the best reforms in the teaching of Mathematics, i.e., the abolition of the wat-tight compartment between Geometry and Algebra.

A First Year's Course in Practical Physics.

By JAMES SINCLAIR, M.A. (Glas.), B.Sc. (Lond.), Head Science Master in Shawlands Academy, Glasgow. With numerous Diagrams. 1s. 6d.

This book is an attempt to provide a course in Practical Physics which is not too difficult for young students, but which contains all that is really essential. It treats of Measurement of Length; Measurement of Area; Measurement of Volume; Mass and Relative Density; Pressure of Air, etc.; Heat.

Bell's English Texts for Secondary Schools.

Edited by A. GUTHRIE, B.A. Assistant Master at Bancroft's School, and Lecturer in English at King's College (Evening Classes), London.

A new series of English texts, designed to provide a complete four years' course in English on the lines suggested by the Board of Education. Full particulars and list of books in preparation will be sent to any address on application.

A Handbook to Shakespeare. By MOSTON LUCE, author of "A Handbook to Tennyson." Fcap. 8vo, 6s.

"Mr. Luce is no blind worshipper, and his criticism is of excellent quality. He has laid students of Shakespeare under very considerable obligations."—SPECTATOR.

Bell's First French Reader. By R. P. ATHERTON, M.A. 1s.

A collection of easy French passages, but of a literary rather than a conversational order. Footnotes in French have been added throughout and, at the end of the book, short sets of sentences and very simple prose.

A French Historical Reader. Being Short Passages giving Episodes from French History, arranged as a First Reader. With Illustrations, brief Notes, and a Vocabulary. By R. N. ADAIR, M.A. (Oxon.), Assistant Master at St. Paul's Preparatory School. 1s. 6d.

Latin Unseens. Selected and Arranged by E. C. MARCHANT, M.A., Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford; Late Classical Master of St. Paul's School. Crown 8vo, 1s.

The Birds of Aristophanes. The Greek Text Revised, and a Metrical Translation on opposite pages, together with Introduction and Commentary. By BENJAMIN BICKLEY ROGERS, M.A. Fcap. 4to, 10s. 6d.

"The editorial work is just what it should be... careful, complete and convincing, and the translation is fascinating."—ATHENÆUM.

in counselling parents to be less anxious about the hours given up to play and more anxious about the manner in which the various games are organised. The wish to move in this respect will come to them as soon as they have made up their minds to value at its proper worth a system of athletics that, so far from being only an arrangement to relieve the masters and to keep the boys out of the tuckshops, is in reality a noble part of education. Parents might do worse than ask many of our Headmasters how it is that running (the official sport of the Easter term) should be treated not less unkindly than Cinderella was treated by her sisters. There is the cricket "Blue"; there is the football "Blue"; but where is the running "Blue"? Parents might ask whether it is becoming that hundreds of boys should go lurching flat-footed over the landscape, untaught how to manage each and every part of the body, and burlesquing at large in English counties the sport that flourished so handsomely when Greece was Greece indeed. They will be better occupied in asking a question such as this than in grumbling because their sons play cricket or football twelve hours a week. Good health is a base of success; and it is on a few acres of level turf that boys should as often as possible be allowed insensibly to fill themselves with the treasure of good health. Wherever else athleticism may be overdone, I am convinced that it is not at our Public Schools. Hands off the cub's birthright, if you please!

THE FOOD AND SLEEP OF SCHOOL CHILDREN

By EUSTACE MILES

"The first shall be last" is a saying especially true of domestic and national necessities. The first, the most important problems, are the last to be dealt with. The best foods, the best exercises, the best subjects for children, the best ways of teaching them—such matters are being discussed now, in the twentieth century, after millions of children have been at once over-fed and starved and poisoned, and otherwise injured physically, intellectually, and morally.

While it has been usual to teach children to obey implicitly, to kill their precious instincts, to memorise thousands of fruitless things; scarcely any effort has been made to teach children how to eat and how to rest.

The "food" of a child—what should it be? Appropriate edibles, eaten rightly at the right times; appropriate drinkables, drunk rightly at the right times; good air; healthy thoughts and conversation. All these things feed a child: they enter into it and build it.

But in this article I must confine myself to foods in the ordinary sense of the word, after a few remarks on a very essential point.

Just as it is not enough to give the child information: the child must also assimilate the information, and therefore must have the right conditions for assimilation; so it is not enough to give the child food: the child must also assimilate the food, and therefore must have the right conditions for assimilation.

One of these conditions is sleep. Sleep gives the active body a chance of resting with its limbs and allowing its organs to make up its arrears.

Sleep is necessary for normal digestion and assimilation of the very best foods. It is equally or more necessary when the very best foods have not been taken: it is necessary in order that the bad effects may be got rid of by extra work on the part of the scavengers of the body. In fact, I would lay it down as a law that, the worse the child's food, the greater the child's need of sleep.

As to the number of hours needed by the child, it is ridiculous to lay down a law at all. I do not doubt that, if a child were sensibly fed and trained and dressed and so forth, quite a few hours would not be too little. For sleep—like work—must be reckoned not by hours but by intensity. Nearly every one reckons work and sleep by the number of hours—a silly calculation. Work and sleep should be judged not by their size (as soldiers and platefuls of foods and fortunes generally are), but by their merits—their results.

As an example, a Hindu runner who knows how to feed, and how to relax the muscles and nerves of his body, can get more repose in a few minutes than a badly fed and tense European can in as many hours.

But, as children are fed and trained at present, they need so much time to finish their digestion and assimilation and their internal remedial work, during sleep, that perhaps ten or even twelve hours would be a fair allowance for many of them.

As to the food, I have not words in which to condemn the carelessness and callousness of those who have hitherto allowed children to be—as I said above—at once overfed and starved and poisoned. The responsibility cannot be placed with the children. Every reader can decide easily where it can and must be placed. And an impartial-minded posterity will lay to the charge of the managers the crime of murder. For there is successful experience to be had at a low price; the mistakes are definite and by no means inevitable. I will prove this by one example.

We know the rate of infant mortality. It is not lowest in the slums of a large city when the hot weather turns food bad so quickly that unscrupulous tradesmen adulterate it with preservatives. Well, in New York, not many years ago, hundreds of children of various ages, taken from the tenements, were for many months fed in a certain way, involving no great expense for the raw materials; during these months there was not a single death among them. The experiment was conducted under impartial supervision. The secret of its success was that the feeding was scientific.

How many English parents and schoolmasters and mistresses have profited by the statistics? I suppose about one in a thousand—perhaps less than one!

Parents and schoolmasters and mistresses who read this will naturally ask for positive advice. I cannot cram into a small space what requires a long book. But I will give an instance of a principle almost universally neglected.

It will not come as a new idea to most people that it is especially the starchy foods that need to be well masticated, so that first of all these foods may be broken up, and then they may be mixed with the digesting saliva which is aroused by the act of mastication.

But apply the general rule in an obvious direction. Consider porridges and wet puddings. How do children eat them? They seldom eat them; they usually swill them down, unmasticated; they almost drink them.

Some digestions are abnormally strong. But the average digestion of a child is upset by the heavy weight of starchy and sugary food, which soon begins to ferment. Perhaps the child looks "fat," but the cause of this is not healthy flesh: it is puffy matter.

Of course some children are taught to masticate even wet starchy foods well. But these are exceptions. As a rule the boy or girl does as the elders do—gobbles.

How can this be prevented?

Easily enough, if starchy food be served dry. As an extreme case, think of the cracknel biscuit. You cannot drink it. You must masticate it; you must break it up and mix it with saliva. You are forced to be physically virtuous.

So, instead of what Dr. Harry Campbell calls the "pappy" foods, that so often ruin the teeth and the digestion, there should, as a rule, be given the dry and crisp starchy foods, such as very thin toast, rusks, and crusts of bread. This class of foods trains the child to masticate, so that, later on, the child will very likely masticate even the wet starchy foods.

And why should not the child be told some of the reasons of things? There is no need to mention diseases. It is enough to point out what is normal and healthy, and the way to this state.

As it is, however, most parents and masters and mistresses come to the most vitally important national work—the training of healthy children, the making of the next generation—utterly ignorant, and, as is the way of elders, as unwilling to receive new truths as they are ignorant.

The knowledge that they need is simple and accessible and cheap. Until they seek and master this knowledge, and put it into practice, I am reluctantly compelled to submit that they are among the most unpatriotic of living animals, and that, from the point of view of personal morality, they are breakers of the Sixth Commandment.

SCHOOL BOOKS

GREEK AND LATIN

MR. MURRAY has issued a new edition of Sir William Smith's Initia Graeca (Part I. 3s. 6d.), a book which needs no recommendation. The revision contains little new matter and the exercises are practically unaltered, but the Accidence has been simplified by cutting out unnecessary forms, and few corrections have been made. To the Rules of Syntax introduced at the last revision a few practical additions have been made; and student and master are provided with a singularly complete, lucid and accurate guide to the grammar and syntax of the best Attic Greek.

Such a work as Dr. Florian Weigel's abbreviated edition of the famous Curtius and von Hartel Griechische Schulgrammatik (Vienna, Tempsky: Leipzig, Freytag), comes rather outside the province of this supplement, as it is unlikely to be used in English schools. But those who know the sterling merits of the original which Dr. Weigel has compressed for common use will be glad to know of the existence of the book, which appears to us to be admirably edited. Mr. Tempsky sends us also the twentieth edition of Karl Schenkl's Griechisches Elementarbuch, a supplement to the twenty-fifth edition of Curtius and von Hartel, edited by Heinrich Schenkl and Florian Weigel (2k. 85h.); and both the firms of publishers named join in the second, enlarged and improved edition of Christian Harder's Angewählte Abschnitte from Thucydides for the use of schools, of which volume ii., containing the commentary, is before us (M 1).

From the Cambridge University Press we have received an edition of Herodotus IV., Melpomene, by Dr. E. S. Shuckburgh (4s.), a new volume in the Pitt Press Series. In this book Dr. Shuckburgh has followed the plan he adopted in the previous books of Herodotus he published some fifteen years ago. First comes the introduction which deals historically, geographically, ethnographically with the subject of the book. Then come the notes on the text; then the text; then the notes, grammatical, exegetical, etc., and finally the geographical Index, which is a mine of information. Book IV. we have never thought an especially interesting book, but its treatment by Dr. Shuckburgh's wide learning, old and new, gives it a charm of its own, and he is careful to bring Herodotus into touch with modern knowledge of the Scythians and of Libya.

Of the text of Bacchylides, edited by Sir Richard Jebb (1s. 6d.), we need say no more, the subject having been fully treated by Professor Tyrrell in an earlier number of the ACADEMY. Dr. Shuckburgh's edition of the Philoctetes, with a commentary abridged from that of Jebb (4s.), is more distinctively a school-book. In it he follows the scheme of his previous Antigone and Oedipus Coloneus. We have first the introduction, which compares (with the help of Dion Chrysostom) the Philoctetes of the three great dramatists, analyses that of Sophocles, and touches on the legend in art and many other pertinent topics; then comes the list of the manuscripts and editions, and the metrical analysis; then Jebb's notes, shortened by about one-third, occupy more than a hundred and sixty pages, and two Indices end the book. It is good that Sir Richard Jebb's monumental labours should be put within reach of schoolboys by so sound a scholar as Dr. Shuckburgh.

We have two other Greek plays before us, Mr. Gilbert Norwood's Andromache (Murray, 2s. 6d.) and Mr. Harold Williamson's Medea (Blackie's Illustrated Greek Series, edited by Professor Tyrrell, 2s.). Mr. Norwood's book is intended for the higher forms in schools and of younger students at the Universities, and he aids them by being careful not to refer to anything outside the play itself without translating or quoting the passage intended. His commentary aims at making the play a living thing, and the introduction is full, sound and interesting. Notes, Appendix on the particles and Vocabulary. Mr. Williamson also gives an Appendix on the particles in his play and other main features of the same kind as Mr. Norwood. Both books are intended for about the same class of students.

The Scriptorium Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis text of Longinus (2s. 6d.), with extracts from Cassius Longinus, is edited by Mr. A. O. Prickard who gives variae lectiones in footnotes, and a textual introduction. Other publications of the same Press are Plutarch's Life of Coriolanus (2s.); text with a short introduction and good, solid notes; selections from Plutarch's Life of Caesar (2s.), by R. L. A. du Pontet, of Winchester, who has put the work together for the use of middle forms as the result of the stimulating effect which he found it had on backward and intelligent boys alike, and has added a few brief notes; and a second volume (2s.) of Mr. E. C. Marchant's Greek Reader, selected and adapted with English notes from Professor von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf's "Griechisches Lesebuch." This book does not confine itself to pure Attic Greek, but embraces later writers; but those who know the masterly original on which Mr. Marchant has drawn will know that there is no cause for alarm on that score. The Greek War of Independence, 1821-1827, by Mr. Charles D. Chambers (Swan Sonnenschein, 3s.), is a Greek text for beginners, with notes, exercises, vocabularies and maps, being an attempt to apply to Greek the principles expounded by Professor Sonnenschein in his "Ora Maritima" and "Pro Patria." The text is the work of Mr. Chambers, who admits having plagiarised largely from Thucydides, whose vocabulary he has followed as closely as possible.

It is possible that Mr. R. H. Carr's edition of North's translation of Plutarch's Lives of Coriolanus, Caesar, Brutus and Antonius (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.) should come under the head of English Readers, since it was with an eye on Shakespeare that the work was completed, and the Introduction and Notes are written for students of Shakespeare. The text has been modernised—an excusable, indeed a necessary, measure in a school-book. Another translation before us is Canon Kynaston's Alcestis, in verse (1s. net), with introduction and notes by Professor Churton Collins, which is intended not only to give school-boys and girls some closer and swifter acquaintance with the Greek spirit than their class lessons in the Greek language can do, but also to appeal to older students—of the University Extension Lectures and so forth. The introduction gives a life and critical study of Euripides besides details about the play, and the notes, if brief, are interesting. Messrs. Brown, Langham send us an "absolutely literal translation" of Xenophon's Anabasis, Book I., by Mr. J. H. Elstob (1s. 6d.). The book is a good "crib," but no more.

We have referred in a previous number to Mr. Arthur Sloman's admirable Grammar of Classical Latin for use in schools and colleges (Cambridge University, Pitt Press Series, 6s.), and have pleasure in returning to a book that will aid the simplification of its subject. Classical Latin, to Mr. Sloman, means Cicero, Caesar, Virgil, Horace and Ovid, and to these only do his statements on Syntax apply. For his Accidence he slightly enlarges the field, including Cornelius Nepos, Tacitus, Catullus, Juvenal and other writers. A most valuable part of Mr. Sloman's work consists in the pruning of other people's errors, and the whole tendency of this book is to simplify and elucidate a subject which a multitude of grammarians have helped to obscure. He divides his book into five parts, Phonology, Accidence, Syntax, Prosody and Etymology, each of which has its own section. While we have not space to dwell in detail on the merits of a very scholarly work, we may remark that it is the best grammar of its size we know, and that Mr. Sloman's innovations, while not so radical as to be disturbing, are all improvements. The book is so printed as to aid the student very much by the use of various types, and we recommend it with confidence to masters who desire thoroughness and simplicity combined. While we are on this subject we may mention also two recent publications of Mr. Tempsky of Vienna: a sixth edition, revised by Dr. Robert Kauer, of Scheindler's Lateinische Schulgrammatik (2 k. 60 h.), and a Schulwörterbuch to Sedlmayer's selected poems of Ovid compiled by Hugo Jurečka (2 k. 40 h.) now in its third revised and improved edition. This book is illustrated with fifty-two plates illustrative of the works treated.

An excellent book for boys learning to appreciate and to write Latin verse is Mr. S. E. Winbolt's little Latin Hexameter (Blackie, 2s.). It does not profess to teach a sense of rhythm, or to enable boys to be all Virgils; but such profit as can be gained by a scientific study of Virgil's rhythms, his phrasing, his vocabulary, his technique in general, can be admirably acquired from this volume, which is arranged for continuous study during six terms. The instructions on setting about to translate a passage into Latin verse are good, and the whole book should be valuable, especially if used as the author directs. Alternate blank leaves for the students' use.

The University Tutorial Series has been increased by a Matriculation Latin Construing Book (2s.), by Messrs. A. F. Watt and B. J. Hayes. The book makes an attempt to formulate rules to guide the learner in translations from the Latin. The authors point out that the reduced time available for classics under the modernising of education makes it necessary that construing should be most systematically taught. The thirty-four sections of this book are so arranged (with copious exercises) as to lead the learner on until he has acquired a fair power of reading at sight; and the book also contains a number of passages set at the London University Matriculation Examination, and a lexicon. For its purpose it is admirably adapted. Those who are learning to translate from English into Latin will find Mr. W. Horton Spragge's Easy Latin Prose (Arnold, 1s. 6d.) a useful book. The hundred and two English passages are all translated from the Latin as literally as is consistent with English style. They are of progressive difficulty, and the footnotes suggest the right word in many cases. A sound book for small boys and girls is Mr. J. A. Stevens's Junior Latin Syntax (Blackie, 8d.).

To the Scriptorium Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis there has recently been added Stati Thebais et Achilleis (Clarendon Press, 6s.), edited with brief critical notes by Mr. H. W. Garrod, another valuable addition to a very valuable library of classical texts. The same Press have issued Mr. F. P. Long's translation of Caesar's Civil War (3s. 6d. net.), which has a long and interesting introduction. Caesar, again, is the material of Mr. W. J. Lowe's little book for beginners in Latin; Tales of the Civil War from the third book, with historical introduction, notes, maps, vocabularies and exercises (1s. 6d.). It will be sufficient to say that the plan of the book is that of Mr. Allen's "Lives from Cornelius Nepos" and "Tales of the Roman Republic" and that the work has been well done. To the second edition of Mr. W. Y. Fausset's Cicero: Orationes Caesarianae, with introduction and notes, Part I. Text (2s. 6d.), which the Clarendon Press has recently published, has been added an Appendix of the chief variants in the text edited by Mr. A. C. Clark (Oxford, 1900). Each of the three speeches has its separate introduction and notes, and the text is broken into the divisions of the argument by brief analytic notes.

A new volume in the Pitt Press Series is Mr. J. D. Duff's C. Plini Caecili Secundi Epistularum Lib. VI. (Cambridge University Press, 2s. 6d.) It is intended for young students, and has full explanatory notes with plenty of translation in them, and indications of the difference between Pliny's syntax and Cicero's. The introduction deals with Pliny's Life, and Pliny's Letters.

The success of Messrs. Watt and Hayes's Matriculation Selections from Latin Authors (University Tutorial Press, 2s. 6d.) is sufficiently shown by the fact that it has now reached its second edition (third impression). A very valuable feature for the purpose of this book is the introduction, which is packed with information on Roman Literature, history, government and antiquities.

We have before us two editions of Cicero's Pro Lege Manilia: one edited for the University Tutorial Series by Mr. A. Waugh Young and Mr. A. F. Watt (2s. 6d.), the other by Professor W. J. Woodhouse of Sydney for Blackie's Illustrated Latin Series (2s.). Both follow very much the same plan: Introduction, dealing with Cicero, Rome in the East, Mithridates, Pompey and the Pirates; text (analysed in Mr. Woodhouse's book, by paragraphs) and notes. The University Tutorial Series edition has an analysis of the speech in the introduction. Mr. Woodhouse's book has a vocabulary and is the fuller of the two, and it has the advantage also of a number of illustrations. So, too, has Messrs. Hemsley and Aston's edition in Messrs. Blackie's series of The Second Macedonian War, being extracts from Livy, Books 31, 32 and 33. The introduction here is very brief; the notes contain much translation and there is a full vocabulary.

To Messrs. Blackie's very useful series of Latin texts, the following additions have been made: The Aeneid, edited by Mr. S. E. Winbolt, each Book in a separate little volume (6d. net each) containing each the same textual, biographical and critical introduction and textual footnotes; Caesar's De Bello Gallico, I.-VI., edited by Dr. W. H. D. Rouse (each 6d. net), in which again the same introduction occurs in each volume; Livy VI. edited by E. Seymer Thomson (6d. net); and the Ilias Latina edited by W. H. S. Jones (6d. net) in which the introduction is briefer than is usual in this admirable little series, the cheapness of which puts good texts within the reach of all.

FRENCH AND GERMAN

ALREADY the English adaptation of Rossmann and Schmidt's French by the Direct Method (Jack's Language Series) has reached its second edition, a proof of the instant popularity of this improved method of teaching French. The system is too well known now to need more than a word of description. It begins by teaching the simple names of things, always employing at the same time either gesture or picture to bring them home to the student: oral exercises before writing begins: no translation from French into English: grammar—and that as little as possible—only when the pupil knows enough of the foreign tongue to be able to piece the rules together bit by bit. Actuality, in fact, is the keynote of the method, which is surely destined to supersede those now in general use. The volumes are as follows: I. First Year's Course (1s. 6d.); Second Year's Course (1s. 8d.); Third Year's Course (2s. 6d.); Fourth Year's Course; Livre d'Exercices (2s.). These are all edited by Mr. Thomas Cartwright, illustrated, and provided with phonetic script, the use of which is advised but not essential. To the Fourth Year's Course also belongs the Livre de Lecture (2s.), which is an illustrated History of France, French Literature and Geography, and the Grammaire Française en Français (10d.), which has the phonetic script. The last two are prepared by Hélène Vivier.

Much on the same principle is a useful little illustrated First Year's French on the Oral Method, by A. H. Smith (Blackie, 1s. 6d.). Phonetic script: chansons, and glossary. Messrs. A. and C. Black also send us a phonetic book—Mr. D. L. Savory's transcription of Kirkman's Première Année de Français, Part I. (Cours Élémentaire, 6d.).

The direct method, again, is employed in Albert Thouaille's First Steps in Colloquial French (Blackie, 2s.), an illustrated book of sixty-three lessons with a short grammar and glossary. Mr. Gauchez Anderson's Nouvelle Grammaire Française for use in English schools (Methuen, 2s.) is intended for pupils who have reached a certain stage in the "reform" method, and devotes itself principally to the difference between English and French idioms. A very useful and sound book, which pays full attention to phonetics and gives diagrams of the organs of speech. The irregular verbs are much simplified by the use of phonetics; and diagrams and tables are frequent. Messrs. Siepmann and Pellissier have compiled their Public School French Primer, comprising reader, grammar and exercises with a chapter on French sounds and lists of words for practice in pronunciation and spelling (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), for pupils of about thirteen taught by the reformed or the old method. It preserves some of the features which the more ardent reformers are perhaps over-anxious to abolish; e.g., translations into French, and grammar. The grammar is, however, rendered as simple as possible, and the system of "Drill," "Exercise" and "Reproduction" is thoroughly sound and should result in accuracy and clearness of thought in the pupil.

The main object of Miss F. M. S. Batchelor's First Exercises in French Grammar (Dent's Modern Language Series, 1s. net) is to prevent the pupil's mind being confused by too many questions at a time. Each exercise deals with one point of grammar only. And English is carefully kept out of the work.

Arnold's Modern French Book, Book I., edited by H. L. Hutton (1s. 6d.) is meant for pupils who have done a year's French by any method. Passages are given of increasing difficulty and to each a number of questions (in French) are appended, the pupil being intended both to ask and answer them.

Extracts for Composition in French for middle and senior classes, with reference to Heath's "Practical French Grammar," edited by Mr. J. E. Mansion (Harrap) is a book that the reformers will not like. Nevertheless it is a sound piece of work, passing from translations from very easy French to difficult passages of English prose.

Among the Readers we welcome heartily the new Oxford Higher French Series, edited by Leon Delbos, which is intended for upper forms and University students. The texts are as complete as possible, the notes advanced, the introductions, when written by Frenchmen, are in their native language; and the volumes are so pleasant to hold and read that they should be popular among others than students. We have before us Lamartine's Jocelyn (3s. net), Mme. de Staël's De l'Allemagne (2s. 6d. net), Mémoires de Mme. Campan (2s. 6d. net), and Gautier's Trois Grotesques (2s. net.) Each volume has a portrait of its author.

To Blackie's Modern Language Series have been added (Galland's) Histoire d'Aladdin (1s. 6d.) with notes and vocabulary; Un petit voyage à Paris, by Marguerite Ninet (1s. 6d.); and Le Livre des Jeux, twelve French games for English children, by A. C. W. Tillyard (1s.). In Dent's Modern Language Series we have Mrs. Boyd's Les Pèlerins de la Tamise, or the wanderings of Pierre and Maurice in England, with notes and exercises (1s. net), and Fables de la Fontaine, with notes, exercises and lessons in versification by Thomas Keen (1s. 6d. net).

Messrs. Macmillan have added to Siepmann's Classical French Texts Montesquieu's Lettres Persanes, adapted by E. Pellissier, with introduction, notes and exercises; and to Siepmann's Primary French Series de la Bédollière's Histoire de la Mère Michel et de son Chat, with notes, vocabulary, questionnaire and other appendices, including passages for translation (1s. net). Mr. H. N. Adair's French Historical Reader (Bell, 1s. 6d.) is an admirable book, presenting a series of interesting and exciting readings in French history, with illustrations, notes and vocabulary; and the same publishers send us a good First French Reader (intermediary between the First and Second Parts of Bell's French Course) in which the extracts are rather literary than conversational. Footnotes in French, and exercises. No vocabulary, as Mr. R. P. Atherton, the author, does not hold with vocabularies. Illustrated by French artists. Messrs. Blackie's long series of Little French Classics has been enriched by Daudet's La Dernière Classe and other stories (8d.); Poésies Choieses de Ronsard et la Pléiade (4d.); a prose version of the Histoire des Quatre Fils Aymon (4d.); Bouilly's L'Abbe de l'Epée (8d.); Stahl's Les Aventures de Tom Pouce (4d.); de Vigny's Histoire de l'Adjudant (4d.), and Choix de Poésies pour les Enfants (4d.). All but the last of these capital little books have introductions, and most have notes: the Daudet has also a vocabulary. New volumes in Dent's Short French Readers are La Révolution Française, extracts from Mignet, Thiers, Michelet, etc. (Fourth Year Readers, 6d.), and Perrault's Contes du Temps Passé, vol. ii. (Second Year Readers, 4d.).

The First German Course for Science Students by H. G. Fiedlen and F. E. Sandbach (Moring, 2s. 6d. net) is a book which will be hailed with delight by many people anxious to be able to read German scientific works. It comprises a Reader and an outline of Grammar with diagrams and a vocabulary, and it assumes no previous knowledge of German. Chemistry and physics are the sciences chiefly dealt with in the Reader, and rightly; other volumes may follow dealing with botany, engineering, etc. The printing of the book aids the study considerably.

Mr. D. L. Savory's First German Reader (Arnold, 1s. 6d.) includes also questions for conversation, grammatical exercises, vocabulary and sentences for re-translation. The grammatical exercises are based on the reading of each piece, and the manner of using the black board as an aid to composition is explained in the preface.

Among other modern-language educational works to which we might call attention are Graham and Oliver's very valuable Foreign Trader's Dictionary of Terms and Phrases in English German, French and Spanish, which is a vocabulary of commercial, financial and special phrases in trade and accountancy work generally for the use of British firms and commercial students (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.); Dent's First Spanish Book, a Spanish learning-book on the reform method by F. R. Robert (2s. net) and Messrs. Marlborough's Italian Self-Taught (3rd ed., 1s. 6d.) and Turkish Self-Taught (4th ed., 2s.).

Despite the multitude of similarly entitled works already in existence there is room for A Grammar of the German Language by G. H. Clarke and C. J. Murray (Cambridge University Press, 6s.), which is primarily intended for examination candidates. For such there is no escape from a certain amount of memory work; but the authors of this grammar have fully realised how much interest can be imparted to the study of their subject by appealing chiefly to the reasoning faculty aided by the imagination. In the hands of a capable teacher this grammar should facilitate recognition of the component parts of lengthy German words and sentences. In conjunction with the study of modern literature, it should do much to enable the intelligent pupil to think in German; but the authors should have indicated the sources of those "modern usages to be found in the works of the best writers" which they have substituted for the stereotyped rules of grammarians. They do not dissociate the teaching of accidence from the teaching of syntax, but deal with both simultaneously. The expediency of dividing verbs into objective and subjective is questionable; the beginner in German has probably made some headway in the grammar of other languages and learned to call these same verbs transitive and intransitive. The picturesque quality of German words is well brought out. And it is certainly an aid to the memory to have troublesome distinctions of gender associated with the romantic element in the character of the Teutonic people, and to realise that it is patriotism that makes the German willing to substitute Fahrkarte for the convenient Billet, or to say Ein noch nicht angestellter Hochschullehrer instead of Privatdozent. The inclusion of these examples of recent changes in the German language is one evidence of the care which has been exercised in bringing this handbook up to date. Another commendable feature is the clearness of the type.

Der Backfischkasten, edited by Gustav Hein (Arnold, 2s.), may be recommended as a means of inducing schoolgirls to take an interest in German lessons. Backfisch is literally a small fish for frying, colloquially a half-grown girl, while kasten=box. Hence Backfischkasten, the box to which the small fry are consigned, or the girls' boarding school. For the beginner especially, these scenes of everyday life, described in the short, idiomatic sentences of everyday speech are not only more attractive, but likely to be more permanently useful than a premature plunge into classic literature. The conversations are calculated to arouse interest, to be almost unconsciously committed to memory and thus to prove a stepping-stone to proficiency in colloquial German. The notes on the idioms are good, and the complete vocabulary is a further encouragement to the beginner, who, as a rule, does not take kindly to dictionaries. Less concern has been given to the conscientious teacher, who, in addition to the text-book, must needs purchase the novel by Feodor von Zobeltitz, from which this amusing description of boarding-school life has been extracted. For lack of a summary of the preceding events of the story, the reader is often puzzled to understand the relationship of the characters one to another. Moreover the interested reader will certainly want to know about the provisions of the codicil of a will on which the plot apparently turns. But the answer is not to be found in the text-book.

Rippmann's Picture Vocabulary (Dent's Modern Language Series, 1s. 6d.) is designed as an auxiliary to more formal methods of teaching German. It consists of what may be described as a succession of ocular demonstrations of the Gouin Method. The little pictures are wonderfully interesting, but we are of opinion that they would have gained in value by being produced on a somewhat larger scale. The average child can hardly fail to be confused by the multitude of letters and lines of indication in some of these illustrations.

MATHEMATICS

A Junior Arithmetic (G. Bell and Sons, 1s. 6d. without answers). A New Shilling Arithmetic (G. Bell and Sons). The former of these contains 204 pages, the latter 176 pages, the difference arising from the Shilling Arithmetic containing no treatment of the first four Rules. The authors of both are Messrs. Pendlebury and Robinson, whose New School Arithmetic is so highly esteemed. The books must not, however, be regarded as compendia of the larger work, but as treatises specially and skilfully put together for the use of the middle and lower forms of secondary schools, even the examples being for the most part new.

The Teacher's Black-Board Arithmetic, Part II. (Blackie and Son, 1s. 6d.). This is a useful manual for teaching the subject to children, and includes a number of questions in mental arithmetic.

Westminster Arithmetic. Loder (National Society's Repository). Standards 1 to 4 are 2d. each net. Standards 5 and 6 are 3d. each. Answers for each set, 4d. net. They are collections of examples satisfying the Code requirements.

Westminster Test Cards. Loder (National Society's Repository, 1s. net per packet). There are seven packets, each containing thirty-two cards and forming sixty-four sets of tests. With each packet is included two copies of the answers. This is a very convenient arrangement for class purposes, and deserves to be popular with teachers.

Arnold's Shilling Arithmetic. Kirkman and Little (E. Arnold). Quite up to date, dealing with approximations and contracted methods, and including a chapter on graphs, this little book contains a number of interesting examples. No answers are given, but we presume they can be obtained from the publishers.

The Three Term Algebra (T. C. and E. C. Jack). The book before us, price 6d., forms the fourth and concluding part of the series, starting with Evolution and ending with the Exponential Theorem and the Theory of Quadratics, the object being to supply a course of preparation for the Oxford and Cambridge Locals. The work is well done, but answers constitute the chief value of such class manuals to the practical teacher, and none are given.

Algebraic Geometry. W. M. Baker (G. Bell and Sons, 6s.). To meet the requirements of the average boy, one-third of this book is devoted to the straight line and circle. Most of the important properties of the Conic Sections, however, are proved either by Algebra or Geometry. The diagrams are numerous and clear, and the use of squared paper is encouraged.

The Elements of Solid Geometry. Davison (Cambridge University Press, 2s. 6d. net). Contains the matter of Euclid Book XI. together with the chief properties of Polyhedra and of Spherical Triangles.

A Manual of Geometry. Eggar (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), is an extension of the same author's Practical Exercises in Geometry in accordance with the Cambridge Schedule. Together with the practical instructions, proofs are indicated which pupils are expected to fill out for themselves.

Elementary Geometry. Purser (Hodges, Figgis and Co.). This little book would probably be found hard by schoolboys. Mr. Purser is Professor of Natural Philosophy at Dublin. He aims, not at furnishing a new edition of Euclid, but at "presenting his subject-matter as a coherent system of geometrical truth." A thoughtful student would no doubt find the work useful.

Geometry Theoretical and Practical. Workman and Cracknell. Part I. (University Tutorial Press). The names of the authors are a sufficient guarantee of sound and clear exposition. There is an excellent chapter also on the topic of the subject, intended to be omitted on a first reading, but which will be appreciated subsequently.

Matriculation Graphs. French and Osborn (University Tutorial Press). This is a selection and expansion of the more elementary portions of the work on Graphs by the same authors. It contains all that is required on this subject for the London University Matriculation.

Mr. Edward Arnold is the publisher of A Second Geometry Book, by J. G. Hamilton and F. Kettle (3s. 6d.), whose First Geometry Book is already widely used. The principle of this second Book is the same. "The practice of springing a demonstration upon the learner before he feels that he is in need of it is psychologically indefensible"; and how many boys have felt in need of the demonstrations of Euclid? The present authors' plan is to teach from experiment up to conclusion, through guesses, experiments, tentative demonstrations and verifications. The problems set are all practical, involving measurement, ruling, etc., and the errors necessarily attaching to all experimental work are made the means of further instruction. Ratio and proportion are approached through arithmetic, and sufficient trigonometry is given to enable a student to solve problems on heights and distance by calculation.

SCIENCE

Elementary Chemistry. Part II. Wilson and Hedley (Clarendon Press, 5s.). This work consists of a series of progressive lessons in Experiment and Theory. The practical instructions are very full and clear, while much pains are taken to explain the conclusions logically deducible from the experiments. It is undoubtedly a book of high educative value and contains besides some useful suggestions for dealing with large classes of boys.

Practical Exercises in Chemistry (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.) Mr. Donington, the author of this book, is senior science master of Leeds Grammar School. It is on much the same lines as the preceding with less detail, though ample for intelligent pupils.

Chemistry Lecture Notes. G. E. Welch, B.Sc. (Blackie and Son, 1s. 6d.). These brief notes are published to save time which, the author thinks, could be more profitably spent in writing essays on the different subjects. Blank pages are introduced for sketches and additional notes.

Systematic Inorganic Chemistry. Caven and Lauder (Blackie and Son, 6s. net). This is a textbook for advanced students from the standpoint of the Periodic Law. The authors are both D.Sc. of London. There is an interesting appendix on the Problem of the Origin of the Elements.

First Year's Course in Practical Physics. Sinclair (G. Bell and Sons, 1s. 6d.). Mr. Sinclair suggests that all theory should be given by the teacher, and therefore confines himself to describing experiments. Numerous exercises, however, are added after each experiment for the purpose of illustrating and enforcing the principles involved.

A First Course in Practical Botany. Scott Elliot (Blackie and Son, 3s. 6d.). This is a good book on an interesting subject. Common flowers have been selected for study, and the author claims that the practical work he describes can be carried out without much expense. A microscope is essential, but it need not cost more than three or four pounds.

Light for Intermediate Students. Rees (Dent and Co., 1s. 6d. net). This is an excellent little treatise, well written, illustrated and printed. It presupposes some knowledge of the subject, and proceeds to treat with the laws of reflection and refraction, etc., in an interesting way. There is also a chapter on Photometry, serving as an introduction to this important branch of the subject.

RALPH, HOLLAND & CO., Educational Publishers,
68 and 69 TEMPLE CHAMBERS, LONDON, E.C.

Press, 2s. 6d.). This book contains laboratory and class-room work for the first two years of Science study. It is meant to supersede the necessity of copious note-taking.

GEOGRAPHY

A Historical Geography of the British Colonies, by C. Lucas. Vol. I. (Clarendon Press, 5s.). This is a second edition of a well-known work, revised and brought up to date by R. E. Stubbs of the Colonial Office. The volume before us treats of the Mediterranean and Eastern Colonies which, though not the most important, are perhaps historically the most interesting. Mr. Stubbs has evidently taken great pains to ensure accuracy, and the text has in every case been submitted for revision to officers having special local knowledge of the dependencies described. The result is a thoroughly readable book, containing much information which could not readily be obtained elsewhere.

A Progressive Course of Comparative Geography on the Con-centric System (G. Philip and Son). This book, of atlas size, is by Mr. L'Estrange, a master at Malvern College. It contains sixty-nine full-page plates of maps illustrating the political, geographical and physical facts of the world. Each chapter is divided into three sections, A, B and C, thus forming courses adapted to pupils of different ages, and the names on the maps are printed in corresponding colours. A series of photographs of cities, scenery and racial types form a special feature of this carefully devised system.

Our Planet (T. C. and E. C. Jack, 1s. 6d.). Belonging to the "Round the World" series, this text-book is put together on the lines of the Board of Education's "Suggestions to Teachers." There are good coloured plates of the chief animals and plants, and a chapter on map-projection and map-reading.

A Scientific Geography, by E. W. Heaton, Book II. (Ralph Holland and Co., 1s. 6d. net). This book deals with the British Isles. Its object is to associate facts which are supposed to be already known, and to supply the materials for drawing sketch-maps now generally required for examinations.

HISTORY

DR. J. HOLLAND ROSE'S "A Century of Continental History, 1780-1880," has now reached its fifth edition (Stanford, 6s.), which has been revised and corrected throughout. Three chapters have been added on the chief events in the history of France, Germany and Russia, 1880-1900. Intended for the upper forms of schools, the book has by now won the high place it deserves. In A Brief Survey of European History (Blackie, 4s. 6d.), Mr. Arthur Hassall embraces the period from the Coronation of Charles the Great to the present day, with special attention to the causes and results of the great movements in History. The results of recent historical investigations have been embodied, so that antiquated opinions and accounts will not be found. Good maps, and an Index, with useful short lists of authorities for each chapter. A good book for higher forms in schools.

In Jack's Concentric Histories we have The Making of Europe (1s. 8d.), compiled in accordance with the recommendations of the Board of Education, which advises that one year be given entirely to European history. The story starts with Europe before the Aryan invasions and comes down to the Franco-German War and the Eastern question. Illustrations and good clear type. Messrs. Ralph, Holland, have published A Concise History of Europe, by Avarly H. Forbes (2s.), which is intended primarily for the candidates for Teacher's Certificates under the Board of Education. The book begins from the fall of Rome and comes down to the present century. Maps and tables.

To Black's School History has been added Mr. Norman L. Frazer's Survey of English History (2s.), in which the author regards his subject as the continual development of the whole national life. His book is intended as a vade mecum for the young student of history. The subject is taken by its chief events, and opposite each brief account of the event comes the year in chronological order, while certain important topics are reserved for special treatment in the continuous summary at the end of the book. Many illustrations, maps, tables.

The University Tutorial Series History of Rome, by Allcroft and Masom, has now reached its third edition, revised and in part rewritten by J. F. Stout. (University Tutorial Press, 3s. 6d.)

There is no need to point out the merits and qualities of the late Edmund Backhouse's Early Church History (Headly Bros.). It is now in its sixth edition, and the publishers are selling it for educational purposes at the nominal price of 1s. net. Written by a Friend, from the point of view of Friends, it has distinctive qualities of its own, which have recommended it far and wide. This cheap edition contains five of the illustrations, and is strongly and handsomely produced.

READERS

THE first of Mr. Nicklin's excellent little series of books on Old Testament History (for sixth form boys) is now before us (Black, 3s.). It covers the period "From the Call of Abraham to the Death of Joshua." The third book—"From the Death of Jehosaphat"—was published last year, and the second has yet to appear. Mr. Nicklin's name on the title-page is a sufficient guarantee of the accuracy, justness and scholarliness which distinguish his book; indeed we know of none better adapted to the needs of fairly advanced students of Old Testament history.

From the Oxford Clarendon Press comes Kingsley's Water-Babies (2s. 6d.), slightly abridged and edited, with introduction, notes and illustrations, by Janet Horace-Smith and Marion L. Milford, with five full-page illustrations by Janet Robertson. The passages omitted—particularly those introducing Aunt Agitate and Cousin Cramchild and the discussions in chapter vi. over the Professor's illness—can very well be dispensed with, and the editors' work has been performed in a spirit of reverence which disarms criticism. We took up the book prepared to resent revision of any sort; we lay it down with a feeling that the youthful reader will appreciate the changes even more than do we. In many respects the book has gained by what has obviously been a labour of love.

One of the best and most thorough readers which have come into our hands for some considerable time is Mr. Walter Raymond's School History of Somerset (Methuen, 1s. 6d.). It is intended primarily for Somerset children, and the author has endeavoured to stimulate local interest in the county, its geography, history, legends and so on—a laudable intention which in no way prescribes its sphere of usefulness. A better short and at the same time comprehensive history of Somerset the schoolmaster will seek in vain. The illustrations are numerous and helpful.

From Messrs. Ralph, Holland, we have received the best school editions of Macbeth (2s.); A Midsummer Night's Dream (1s. 9d.), and Books I. and II. of Paradise Lost (2s.), we have seen so far. Mr. C. W. Crook has edited the Shakespeares; Mr. A. L. Cann the Milton. In the space at our disposal it is impossible to do more than illustrate the method adopted in one volume—A Midsummer Night's Dream—where Mr. Crook divides his introduction into twelve sections: Hints to the Student; The Life of Shakespeare; The Theatre before and during the Time of Shakespeare; Sources of the Play; Date of the Play; General Remarks; Story of the Play; Peculiarities of the Play; Characters in the Play; The Language of the Play; The Metre of the Play; and Figures of Speech. It is in every respect a thorough and praiseworthy piece of work.

Mr. J. C. Stobart's The Age of Chaucer (1s. 6d.)—the first volume of a new series, Epochs of English Literature, published by Mr. Edward Arnold—sets a high standard which we trust will be maintained by the volumes which are to follow. His selection is admirable, and he has exercised a wise restraint in modernising spelling.

Mr. Edward Arnold has done well to publish a book of Selected Poems of Matthew Arnold (1s. 6d.), for pupils in middle and upper forms of secondary schools. There is a good introduction by the editor, Mr. Richard Wilson, and the few necessary notes are given at the end.

Messrs. Collins's Graphic Story Reader, Book VI., consists of selected extracts, prose and verse, of very unequal merit. A few are good, but it is difficult to see why many were chosen. The coloured illustrations are very crude.

Another reader sent us by Messrs. Collins—Book VI. of the Prince Edward Readers—merits a word of praise and a word of condemnation. The selections are quite up to the average of such books, but again the illustrations offend us. That of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza differs very much from our conception of the two redoubtable heroes.

The fourth of Messrs. Blackie's Model Readers (1s. 4d. each) in no way falls short of its predecessors. As in the "Graphic Story Reader," there are selections in prose and verse, but they are uniformly good, and the illustrations without exception are dainty and pleasing.

A little volume on wild flowers, as unpretentious as it is useful, is welcome. Mr. Thomas Fox's How to Find and Name Wild Flowers (Cassell) should prove valuable not only to a certain class of "grown-ups," but also to the many thousands of children who need only some slight quickening of interest and a little guidance to become real nature-lovers. The book is divided into two parts, of which the first is devoted to the wild flowers to be found each month from February to September, the second to arrangement: natural orders, genera and species. Within the last few years we have had many similar books, some better and many a good deal worse; and the only serious fault we have to find with Mr. Fox's work is one for which he is probably not responsible. We refer to the illustrations. They are thoroughly bad and useless; we should never have recognised groundsel (senecio vulgaris) from the reproduced photograph on page 17.
